WHAT WE THINK

A question of priorities

February 18th marked the last day on which fox-hunting could legally be practised in the United Kingdom. It was a day of great rejoicing for the anti-foxhunting brigade, while for the hunting community it was one of nostalgia and sorrow mixed with defiance: many proclaimed their resolve to carry on, law or no law. Some vowed they would break the law; others said that they would operate within it while continuing to kill foxes – by shooting them instead of having them torn apart by the hounds.

For our part, we have tended on the whole to support the hunting faction. This is not because, given the choice, we would wish to engage in foxhunting ourselves. It is because the hunt is a long-established British rural tradition, and we can see that the motivation of the political left in opposing it has nothing whatever to do with compassion for animals and everything to do with a war against tradition per se. We can also see that another factor in the Left's opposition to hunting is pure class hatred – misplaced because, far from the hunt being a pastime just for the country gentry, it is engaged in by people from all social groups.

We have also supported foxhunting because, at the end of the day, we believe that its participants should have the freedom to engage in a pastime of their choice. We do not believe that individual freedom should be absolute (as do many Tory libertarians); it has to be curbed when the national interest requires. However, here there is no vital national interest that calls for the curbing of this particular freedom; hence it should have been preserved.

All this having been said, a few additional comments are called for, which some may think do not read well from the standpoint of the pro-hunting fraternity. We have to say that in the passion they have put into their cause they have shown a peculiar sense of priorities and, also, a great deal of hypocrisy.

Hunting has been defended – in some instances by quite militant means, such as the invasion of Parliament last September – on the grounds that it is an essential part of our British culture and identity. The Spectator magazine on 19th February featured a totally over-the-top headline on its front page saying 'Goodbye England'. Inside was an article by editor Boris Johnson in support of hunting and praising those who have fought, and will continue to fight, to preserve the tradition. This was, equally absurdly, titled 'The end of part of England'.

Well maybe. But does it not occur to Mr. Johnson, and indeed the whole of the hunting community, that 'England' – or to be more precise Britain – is menaced by certain other forces far more than by the anti-hunt mob? The end of England/Britain is heralded when we cast our eyes on almost any street in any major city, or on the entrances to schools in places like London, Birmingham, Leicester, Bradford, Manchester, Liverpool – and more lately Glasgow. We can see it in the election literature of the mainstream parties and in police recruiting advertisements, now printed in a multitude of languages as well as English. The dire threat to our national existence posed by immigration and multi-racialism dwarfs into insignificance the legislation aimed at putting an end to foxhunting, undesirable though this legislation may be.

So why are these folk, so angry and passionate about the abolition of their right to hunt foxes, not putting some of that anger and passion into speaking out and demonstrating against the systematic destruction of their nation and all its culture and traditions that is consequential on the growth in this country of a huge and ever-burgeoning non-white population?

The answer is, of course, that a great many of them – perhaps the majority – are unhappy about the latter, but they are simply too frightened to be seen opposing it in any meaningful way. It would not fit nicely with their respectable image in their various rural communities, and in the cases of some it might jeopardise their jobs and businesses.

Far better, then, a 'safe' form of protest against all that is going on in the name of liberalism, leftism and political correctness, all that bears the stamp of New Labour.

It is for this reason that we find it rather an effort to feel great sympathy for the hunters who last month enacted their final rituals amongst much chagrin and tears.

His master's voice?

Newspaper headlines on the 15th February announced that the new Home Secretary, Charles Clarke, contrary to protestations made by Prime Minister Blair a short time earlier, had said that Britain needs more, not fewer, immigrants. This statement was regarded as highly embarrassing to Clarke's chief, as hitherto he had been desperately trying to persuade the electorate that Labour would bring out its own programme for immigration controls (see our editorial on page four). Who was actually speaking for the Government, Blair or Clarke?

We suspect that there was more to this contradiction than meets the eye. It seems inconceivable that Mr. Clarke would come out with a public declaration of such momentous importance, not to say controversy, had he not first cleared it with the Premier. What is afoot? Is this Labour's way of trying to face two ways at once: Blair pitching his appeal to the British majority while his underling gives the wink to the various minorities that he (Blair) doesn't really mean what he says. Was the Clarke outburst calculated to mollify Labour's left? In the coming months perhaps more will be revealed, but we can say with fair certainty that Mr. Blair's talk of 'controls' is nothing more than hot air, and that we will see no action whatever on the matter – any more than we will, by the way, from the Tories. Remember, folks, there is an election just round the corner, and the voting proles have to be thrown a few crumbs!

Hoist with their own petard

We have always been somewhat sceptical about the usefulness of the British Council, whose job is to tell the world about Britain's virtues and achievements. A truly strong, proud and self-confident nation does not feel bound to keep on proclaiming to everyone how great it is; it lets its deeds speak for it. It seems that the less Britain has come to count among the nations the more it has felt bound to keep reminding others, at huge national expense, how much it still does count.

There was outrage in the press last month when a recent British Council promotion depicted our country in what many thought was the worst possible light, telling everyone how bad a deal ethnic minorities get (sic!) and how riddled the country is with 'racism'. Included was an illustration of an urban scene where teenagers were shown playing under an advertising hoarding showing a National Front logo beside a swastika. There were also pictures of the fenced-off entrance to the Channel Tunnel.

Apparently, a Muslim group was commissioned to produce this promotion, and its purpose was to illustrate Britain to the Islamic world. The outrage at the result was prompted by anger at how little this group seemed to appreciate the country that had opened its doors to immigrants, including Muslims, and how it was instead determined to sell us short.

Well, serve the British Council bloody well right! If it was daft enough to authorise this promotion, it deserves the opprobrium coming to it. Quite how a body, charged with promoting the best image for Britain overseas, is fulfilling that task by appointing such a gang in the first place is beyond the understanding of any sane person.

Islam threatens: will party leaders back down?

More outrage! This time it comes from Muslim leaders, who are threatening to withdraw support from the Tories and Liberal Democrats because of their opposition to the Government's religious hatred bill. The bill, as readers will know, aims to make incitement to religious hatred an offence in the United Kingdom just as is incitement to racial hatred, and we publish an article on that very subject in this issue.

According to a report in The Sunday Times on 6th February:-

"The leaders, who are from some of the most influential Muslim organisations in the country, say that they may tell their communities to 'take into account' the stance of the two parties on the bill when they cast their votes in the general election expected this year."

This invites two comments. The first is that we have reached quite a pass in formerly Great Britain when a minority community feels it can apply blackmail against British political parties in the way that is evident here. Perhaps indeed it can!

The other comment is more in the way of a question. Will Messrs. Howard and Kennedy stand firm in the face of this threat? If past and present form is any guide, this is in some doubt. Neither leader is exactly made of the breed that defended Rorke's Drift (in Howard's case not his fault!). One thing can be said with certainty. Whatever the two may do, their decisions will be calculated solely in terms of electoral profit or loss and in no way influenced by any consideration for the national interest.

Anti-Semitism? No, just plain silliness

In the huge stink that the Tories and the press kicked up at the end of January over Labour's allegedly 'anti-Semitic' election posters depicting Michael Howard and Shadow Home Secretary Oliver Letwin the real point of the issue seems to be lost.

As is known, one poster showed Howard in a Shylock-like pose holding a watch, while another portrayed Howard and Letwin as flying pigs. The national paranoia over Jewish matters inevitably burst loose, and Labour was accused of exploiting the Jewishness of the two Tories for electoral gain.

For a party so heavily in hock to Jewish interests, the suggestion was utterly absurd. What the posters demonstrated was not the sinister spectre of 'anti-Semitism' emerging in Labour's ranks but the sheer juvenile level to which contemporary British politics have now descended. This stuff was an insult, not to the Jews, but to the intelligence of the readers of schoolboy comics, who despite their tender years would probably expect something a bit more serious.

And in that regard we can expect manifestations equally infantile from the Tories and LibDems as the election gets nearer.

Remembering Dresden

Last month ceremonies were held in the German city of Dresden marking the 60th anniversary of the terrible raids by British and American bombers which devastated the city in the final months of the Second World War, with a death toll variously estimated between 35,000 and ten times that number (depending on one's viewpoint).

As on most such occasions, genuine reflection on tragedy is mixed with stupid chatter and axe-grinding. One example of the latter was a report in The Sunday Telegraph (6th February) saying that German 'Neo-Nazis' (for whom read patriots) were going to the ceremonies to stage 'anti-British' protests. Actually, the protests were aimed, not against Britain as such, but against the British establishment, which whines about the 'Holocaust' involving Jews but tries to justify this one by citing the necessities of war.

But some Germans are just as bad. Stephan Fritz, pastor of the city's Frauenkirche, attempted to whitewash the bombing by saying that Dresden had been a 'Nazi city', like all the rest of them.

So that makes the incineration of these countless thousands of innocent people all right then!

Time to cut the cackle in the immigration debate

FOR HALF A CENTURY, the politicians of the mainstream parties have turned a virtual blind eye to the festering sore of immigration and its potentially dire consequences for Britain's future as a nation. When faced with protest from the voters or from small parties outside the mainstream, the best they have been able to come up with is to call their critics 'racist' and dismiss their views as of no account.

But now these mainstream parties are beginning to wake up in horror to the huge wave of public anger over the immigration issue and to count the implications in terms of lost votes. They are rattled, and they are looking for ways to hoodwink the people and assure them that something is being done.

In January, Tory leader Michael Howard, whose previous record in confronting immigration has been abysmal, came out with a set of proposals for 'controls' obviously calculated with the coming general election in mind. They include an annual maximum limit to new arrivals; 24-hour security at ports to stop illegals coming in; an Australian-style points system for work permits; an assurance that those claiming asylum would have to produce evidence of genuine need; and the pulling out of Britain from the 1951 UN Convention on Refugees, which restricts the nation's powers to control its own borders. Indignant at charges of 'racism', he said: "This is not to do with race," and he went on to say: "We will offer sanctuary to more genuine refugees than obtain sanctuary in this country today."

JUST COSMETIC

All in all, an example of the old French saying that the more things change the more they stay as they are. The briefest look at Howard's proposals will indicate that they amount to pure cosmetics which will achieve nothing.

Labour, while slamming Howard, felt bound to make its own noises, again with the general election in view. Endorsing the same Australian points system, it spoke of preferences for highly skilled migrants; agreements with migrants' countries of origin to take them back if they overstay their time; a slightly longer period of residence before permission is given to stay permanently; also language tests and the ridiculous 'Britishness' test exposed in our pages last month. Other than these things, all that seems to be on offer is improved 'hi-tech' surveillance on those arriving and leaving.

It is noticeable that both Tory and Labour proposals, utterly inadequate and meaningless though they are, do nothing whatever to address the matter of the huge ethnic minority population that has been present in Britain for a long time and which is the source of most of the immigrant problems that bedevil this country.

HOWARD

Trying to steal the BNP's clothes

GRASPING THE NETTLE

In the spirit of cowardice that has characterised every approach to immigration since the old parties began importing the problem in the 1950s, both Tory and Labour proposals to deal with it now are founded on the pretence that, as Mr. Howard says, "this is not to do with race." Of course, the truth is that it has everything to do with race. Racial considerations are by far the most important ones that should govern our decisions as to who should be allowed into this country and who should be allowed to stay. Let us face it, if folk of ethnically British descent came to settle here they would be only be coming 'home'. If Swedes or Dutch people came here they would present no problems of integration. As for the genuineness or otherwise of 'asylum' claims, these are completely irrelevant. A sane and sensible nation is particular about the kind of people who make up its population. It is entitled to demand quality and affinity. If that is 'racist', so be it!

The things they're saying

Multi-culturalism is in crisis. By that I don't just mean that political correctness has 'gone mad', as the Daily Mail likes to put it: the British public worked that out long ago, and merely shrugs when it learns (for example) that the Lake District National Park is to abolish its guided walks because they attract insufficient numbers of black people. 'Political correctness' is shorthand for the etiquette and working practices of the most influential ideology of our age: multi-culturalism or 'identity' politics'. And that ideology is falling apart...

The notion that the essential function of multi-culturalism is to assuage the guilt of a white élite certainly makes sense; the interesting question is whether the ideology can survive the evidence of its practical failure and the growing mockery of its supposed beneficiaries. I suspect that it might not: the anti-racist functionaries are beginning to grow pale and weary like the gods in Das Rheingold, deprived of their youth and dimly aware that a world order is collapsing about them.

DAMIAN THOMPSON
The Spectator (29.1.05)

In his 'personal pledge' to restrict the number of people coming into Britain, Michael Howard did not fail to include the customary proviso without which no pronouncement on this subject may be made: "Some people say this is racism. It is not. It is common sense."

It is both 'racism' and common sense. The word 'racism', always remember, is of quite recent coinage. If it meant the universal and ineradicable human tendency to distinguish between different races, their differing qualities and potentials and to prefer some races to others, then until recently everybody was 'racist' and most people are 'racist' now...

When Mr. Howard dutifully disavowed 'racism', he was making obeisance to this hypocritical convention. This did not, of course, save him from immediate accusations in the media of "playing the race card." He would have done better to take courage, disavow the whole fraudulent apparatus of 'anti-racism' and 'political correctness', denounce it for all the harm it has done to this country and all it is going to do. He might as well have "played the race card," in fact.

PETER SIMPLE
The Daily Telegraph (28.1.05)

I am constantly plagued by smug wiseacres who tell me that I must support the Useless Tories because they are the 'only alternative' to Labour. Look, listen a moment, will you?

The Tories would only be an alternative if

EXTRACTS FROM THE MAINSTREAM MEDIA

(a) they could win an election; and (b) they would be any different from Labour if they did.

Well, they won't win. Tory headquarters echoes to the weeping of its experts, who stare in despair at the dismal private polls.

Hence Michael Howard's pathetic death-bed conversion to the cause of limiting immigration. Sadly, since he is a keen supporter of the EU, which will not allow him to do any of the things he promises, the conversion is meaningless.

PETER HITCHENS
The Mail on Sunday (30.1.05)

So the Prime Minister visits a dreary daytime chat show and Coronation Street. Next stop, Top of the Pops. With his backing for house arrests we await his stint in Celebrity Big Brother.

The election campaign has yet to begin (officially) but already we voters are in despair. Will Michael Howard demand parity from the BBC and a duet with Jamelia?

Labour's advertising demon is Trevor Beattie, whose greatest contribution to civilisation was the FCUK campaign. Tony Blair's campaign says FCUK the voters and FCUK thought. Alastair Campbell, hauled back from the funny farm, releases two of the crassest posters ever and calls this "being professional."

Even when Blair does touch on politics he merely seeks to deceive, such as 'cracking down' (again) on incapacity benefit while assuring its 2.7 million recipients that, er, he isn't.

Negativity, lies – yep, it could work. But please, Tone, spare us the hand-wringing afterwards about why we are alienated from politics.

JASPER GERARD
The Sunday Times (6.2.05)

I will go further: the history of Iraq since the Twenties demonstrates that only dictatorship, whether moderate or ruthless, could hold together a country so fractured by racial, religious and clan rivalries. I do wonder if either Bush or Blair have ever bothered to study Iraq's political and social past.

So if – if! – Bush and Blair's hoped for 'democracy' is up and running in Iraq by 2006, how long will it last? One year? Five years? Will the new Iraqi army always prove loyal to democratic governments?

And if, in the distant future, another Saddam seizes power, will we have to invade the country all over again?

CORRELLI BARNETT
Daily Mail (27.1.05)

The great intellectual curse of the French Revolution, which has crippled political thought for more than two centuries, was the reduction of all discourse into 'left' and 'right'. From the beginning, it was an infantile notion that replaced rational argument with a playground division into two gangs who understood nothing clearly except how much they hated each other. Despite the fact that nobody has ever been able to define the beliefs of 'left' and 'right' or the differences between them, this has not stopped political humanity joining these sides and facing each other with all the fury of Lilliput and Blefuscu fighting over whether to break eggs at the big end or small end. The resulting feuding has been sterile and idiotic. It has stymied political philosophy. It must end if we are to progress with rational politics.

ANDREW KENNY
The Spectator (5.2.05)

Civil liberties groups are bouncing up and down in outrage at the Government's proposals to put foreign terrorists under house arrest.

Funny, I don't remember hearing a peep out of them when Jack Straw put Chile's General Pinochet under house arrest in Britain at the request of an attention-seeking Spanish magistrate.

RICHARD LITTLEJOHN
The Sun (28.1.05)

Ah yes, we need to have an 'honest and open public debate' about immigration, the Government says. What a novelty!

Some of us recall that governments (of both parties) have been promising that for – what is it, 20, 30 or 40 years? It is hard to keep the score.

But the result is always the same: vague noises about tightening up, calls for more accurate statistics (curiously unavailable from Whitehall) and less vague noises about the wickedness of racism. And still the number of legal and illegal immigrants mounts, as does public anger.

ANDREW ALEXANDER
Daily Mail (28.1.05)

The Government has mishandled immigration throughout its time in office. Now, within sight of elections, it expects us to be so supine as to trust it finally to grasp the immigration issue.

As a retired immigration officer, I have repeatedly criticised the abolition by the last Conservative administration, on grounds of cost, of the embarkation control.

TONY ADAMS
Letter in The Times (9.2.05)

DEATH AND TRAGEDY IN 'FREEDOM'S' CAUSE

A FRONT-PAGE headline in The Sun newspaper on 31st January said it all. A number of British and Commonwealth servicemen, estimated at "up to 20" but later found to be fewer, had just been killed when an RAF Hercules transporter plane crashed in Iraq on the very day voters in that country were going to the polling stations to take part in the first election there since the toppling of Saddam Hussein. At the top right-corner of the page an Iraqi woman was pictured giving a 'victory' salute, while the big headline said of the men lost in the crash: "They died for freedom."

The servicemen, actually ten in number, included some elite SAS and other special forces troops. They comprised a cross-section of the very best of young British (and in one case Australian) manhood. They were men who had been trained at considerable national expense – though that, of course, was never the main consideration in their tragic loss. They had died in a remote foreign desert, and for what purpose? Defending their country? Protecting any of its vital interests? Fighting its enemies? No, none of these things. They were in Iraq as part of the process of maintaining peace and order on polling day. Their deaths provided yet one more example of the utter madness of internationalism.

Tony Blair, of course, had to say something. He it was who sent these men to Iraq in the first place on the basis of a lie: that the Iraqis had in their possession "weapons of mass-destruction" – this lie serving to sustain another: that, had such weapons existed, they would have been used against Britain or her interests or people. Tony proclaimed: "Yet again, we see the sacrifice they make. The families of those who lost their lives can be so proud of what their loved ones accomplished."

Sacrifice made for what? And what did the dead men accomplish? Blair's words amount to just another sample of the empty rhetoric so beloved of liberals, who for ever imagine that their publics will accept pious sentiments as substitutes for the real and the meaningful. Everyone recognises that soldiers and members of the other services have to be prepared to make sacrifices, sometimes of their lives, where the survival and interests of their country are at stake; and their families are proud of them when they fulfil this duty. But when such sacrifices are made for any other purpose – in particular when the purpose is only to feed the vanity of politicians and enable them to satisfy the clamour of noisy lobbies and win pats on the head from foreign leaders – whatever pride there may be is submerged in anger: the anger, for instance, of the uncle of Scott McArdle (22) of the Black Watch, killed with two comrades by a suicide car bomber in Iraq a mere two months before the Hercules crash. He said: "The boys were prepared to defend their country but not to go and fight other countries' wars."

But fighting other countries' wars is what it seems to be all about in these days of presumed 'global responsibility'. Look at any recruiting poster for our armed services and you are unlikely to read anything about young people being needed to defend Britain. Far more probable is a load of vapid politicians these Iraqis elected, or whether indeed they had the chance to elect any at all. The minority here with any knowledge of Middle Eastern affairs know full well that the processes of the system we know as 'democracy' are almost wholly strange and alien to peoples like the Iraqis, that the latter have no overpowering desire for them, and that all they really want is food, water and other basic services, and security and peace to go about their own lives with a semblance of order around them. Actually, under Saddam Hussein they had these things to a degree seldom experienced in their past and most certainly not experienced since he was overthrown. But at the end of the day why should British people care a damn either way? We have mountainous problems of our own here in this country which should be occupying us 100 per cent and should be the objects of our leaders' full focus. We simply have not time to worry about what happens in Iraq; and least of all should we be wanting our armed forces personnel to be over there shot at and bombed while they attempt to hold the ring.

Behind all the hype

Of course, we know that there is much more to all this hocus-pocus about 'democracy' and 'freedom' for Iraq than meets the eye. We know that powerful interests are involved: the interests of oil; the interests of Zionism, Israel and Jewry; the interests of politicians, on both sides of the Atlantic, beholden to these powers. We know that Iraq was not invaded, then occupied, to bestow this mythical 'freedom' on its people; we know that these things took place for reasons wholly different and utterly remote from the desires and concerns of the ordinary man or woman in the street in Baghdad or Basra. We know that the recent elections in Iraq were simply charades staged to ensure that US-Zionist puppets occupied the country's political offices while the Iraqi people were mumbo-jumbo about social and welfare work to be carried out among people in the Balkans whose needs have only arisen because the internationalists of a decade or so ago took it upon themselves to interfere in that region of the world, where far fewer problems would have been caused had the locals been left to sort out their own local quarrels.

Iraq has elections – big deal!

When the Iraqis went to vote on 30th January, British journalists and broadcasters went into ecstasies of national self-congratulation – as if it were any damned business of ours, indeed if it mattered a gnats eyebrow to people in this country what bamboozled into thinking they got there by their (the people's) free democratic choice. All this is known and understood by serious students of world politics who take care to use their faculties to inform themselves and to think.

The issue was never better put than in an editorial in The Barnes Review magazine*, published in Washington for January/February 2005, which said:-

"'Democracy' has nothing to do with procedures, fair elections, numerous parties or equal access to media. Democracy, or any other term used often in politics, never refers to anything that abstract. All political abstractions mask a specific content, a specific agenda of a group of powerful people. The history of political thought cannot be separated from the power relationships that exist in any society that produces political thought.

"Democracy, however, has a consistent use within the system of American empire. First, it refers to an economic system. The system in this regard considered 'democratic' is one that permits the International Monetary Fund to set macro-economic policy. It is demanded that states permit the free access of multi-nationals to natural resources and cheap labour. Any sort of protections for labour need to be done away with, and large industry is favoured over small proprietorship.

"Secondly, 'democracy' has a social and cultural content. 'Democracy' (and its close cousin 'civil society') refers to free access to abortion, gay rights, separation of religion from state and the complete denationalisation of society. No nationalist party or organisation is permitted to have any power or authority over anything. Years ago, when Jörg Haider's Freedom Party won a sizeable chunk of Austria's parliament, it was condemned worldwide as 'anti-democratic'. When Serbia's radicals won local elections recently, this too was called 'anti-democratic'. The fact that all of these came about through free and fair elections was irrelevant, for 'anti-democratic' can only refer to the loss of the empire's status in a particular state."

Liberal hypnosis

The foregoing having been said, the very fact that the airy-fairy 'democratic' scenario as depicted in Iraq should actually be believed in and supported with passionate conviction by tens of thousands of small-time newspaper columnists, and millions of their readers, throughout the West is an indication of the hypnotic spell cast by liberal, one-world ideology over masses of people. Of course, in the case of the media operatives the spell is well lubricated by the generous salaries they earn and the numerous perks that go with the job; it suits them to believe the hogwash that they write and speak. But the same cannot be said of their readers and viewers, large numbers of whom actually accept that countries like the US and Britain have a 'duty' to bring free(!!!) elections to Iraqis, if necessary at the cost of the lives of their soldiery.

The same is true, of course, of the hysteria that politicians and journalists are able work up over the plight of the poor and hungry in the Third World. Our Chancellor, Gordon Brown, has recently announced a plan likely to cost Britain £1 billion, designed to provide aid for countries said to be below the 'poverty line', whatever that is; and he has called upon the other richer nations to follow our lead. There is nothing new about this; it has been going on for more than half a century, while the Third World is still as poor as ever it was. We know, of course, that in Brown's case it is all an act. He wants to get himself the title of Africa's number-one champion in Britain; and why is this? Simple. Gordon wants the Labour leadership, and he sees the party's left wing as his constituency. The Labour left consists of legions of folk to whom Third World poverty is a cause for ritual hand-wringing and agonised sleepless nights. What makes so many people think it worth giving all that money to hungry Africans rather than spend it on hungry Britons and on achieving better public services at home? Again, the phantom of 'global responsibility', the internationalist 'liberal conscience'. The good socialist and progressive must love and care about every country but his own.

Condoleezza reads the Riot Act

A report appeared in The Sunday Telegraph on 6th February which should give us cause for serious reflection. It said that the recently appointed US Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, had announced that Washington "would not tolerate" any further erosion of democracy in Russia. Said the good lady during a trip to Poland:-

"It is important that Russia make clear to the world that it is intent on strengthening the rule of law, strengthening the role of the independent judiciary, permitting a free and independent press to flourish. These are all basics of democracy."

The report went on to say that the White House had grown increasingly alarmed over President Vladimir Putin's authoritarian stance, and that there was widespread concern at his attempts to centralise control over the media and to concentrate power in the hands of a small group of former KGB staff.

Now this really deserves a bit of analysis. The rule of law! Does Miss Rice really contend, as we might infer, that America's multi-racial cities provide admirable examples of the rule of law – examples that the world would be recommended to follow?!!! And what about a free and independent press? Almost the entire press and broadcasting services in the United States are controlled, directly or indirectly, by Jewish interests and employed for Jewish interests. Where they do not actually own the newspapers (and they own most of the main ones) they can keep them in line by advertising pressures. But that, according to Miss Rice and her boss in the White House, means 'freedom'. We are reminded of the Barnes Review leader article. 'Freedom' means what the wealthy and the powerful decide it will mean!

BRINGING HOME THE DEAD
A coffin containing one of the crash victims returns to the UK

If Mr. Putin is taking measures to ensure that the mass media in Russia do not fall into the hands of the same kinds of monopolies and come to be used in the service of interests that are not Russian, that is no more than his duty as a national leader. State control of the media may not be totally healthy, but such control – providing that the state is a patriotic one – is a good deal less unhealthy than control by alien minorities and use in alien causes.

But overriding all this – all the arguments about the rule of law and control of the press – is the quite staggering impertinence of an American political leader in laying down the law to Russia over what is essentially Russia's business. "Washington would not tolerate..." Just who do these people in Washington think they are? The answer, of course, is that they are internationalists and globalists and consider that everything that goes on everywhere in the world is their legitimate concern and something into which they have both the right and the duty to poke their fingers. A judge in Irkutsk delivers a sentence indicating political bias (of course American judges never do that!). This will not be tolerated in Washington. A newspaper in Rostov is censored by government. Washington will not tolerate that either. Call in the Russian Ambassador. Arrange trade boycotts. If it comes to the crunch, send in troops!

Lecture on one-world utopia

This is the internationalist mentality at work. I recall that as a boy at school I was once told by one of my teachers that nationalism was a bad thing because it caused wars; when we had one big, happy united world with no national borders all would be peace and love between peoples. I didn't believe it at the time but I didn't have enough evidence to argue back. Korea, Vietnam, the Balkans and now Iraq have provided quite enough of this. I wonder if that teacher is still alive to see his beliefs come to fruition!

The globalists in Washington are now seeking to sort out Iran. There is also Syria. Then there's also North Korea. Where next?

THE LATE Alan Clark, MP, once wrote the following words about a meeting he had with two activists of the 'far right': "And I thought how good they were, and how brave is the minority, in a once great country, who still keep alive the tribal essence." Sadly, Clark himself lacked this quality of courage, but did at least make ringing denunciations of the NATO/NWO carnage in Yugoslavia at the very end of his life.

Clark's comments are as good an introduction as any to the events of mid-December last year, when both John Tyndall and Nick Griffin were arrested on suspicion of 'incitement to racial hatred'. In John Tyndall's case, the 'incitement' consisted of a speech made to BNP members and supporters in Burnley last March which included a few references to the family origins of Michael Howard. The arrests must surely have been among the last acts authorised by David Blunkett before his overdue and unlamented departure from the Home Office.

One top judge (I forgot which one; they're all nearly interchangeable today) has said that political arrests or trials never take place in Britain. But this is the most blatant hypocrisy: the present ruling clique in this country, with its 25 per cent mandate, acts in the manner of former East Germany's Stasi. The arrests may have been intended to placate New Labour's Muslim electorate following the Iraq debacle. However, most Muslims are intelligent enough to understand quite well that their real enemies are not Griffin or Tyndall, but the likes of Sharon, Bush and Blair.

UNDERHAND SPYING

The sleazy and underhand manner in which the initial evidence in this case was gathered deserves comment. Supposing a fly-on-the-wall bug or camera were to be placed in the offices of Blair's former sponsor Rupert Murdoch – whose antipathies are said to include Irish, Blacks, Germans and Arabs – might not the BBC have gathered some more interesting and entertaining material? And how about police canteens? Or even Labour clubs?

Well, there's evidence that they've been financing opposition parties in Ukraine and getting steamed up over Belarus. They don't like the chap in the latter country – by name Lukashenko – and so he has to go! Russia? Well, that's rather a big one. Let's restrict things to diplomatic insults for the time being. Even Bushy realises he can't take on everyone at once, but you can be sure that, with the assistance of Messrs. Perle, Wolfowitz, Strauss, Kristol, Fleischer, Shulsky et al, he's working on it!

In the meantime, there will be grieving wives, mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, aunts and uncles and grandparents in various places from Londonderry to Dover, from Wick to Penzance, who, when they hear of their loved ones being slaughtered in distant lands in the prime of life, will have to be consoled by the thought that it was all for 'freedom'.

IAN BUCKLEY puts the spotlight on...

DIFFERENT RULES FOR THE BRAVE MINORITY

The Daily Telegraph can make jokey comments about the 'Torah Party' in its pages, but when Tyndall does something similar it becomes 'incitement'. Even though such laws are absurd, isn't there an element of snobbery prevailing here? Michael Howard's ancestry can be alluded to 'in house', as it were, by an arch-Conservative paper but beware of the dangers of doing the same in front of the so-called 'proles' of Burnley BNP. Mr. Howard himself – and Howard he will have to remain, for the thought police may be reading* – can hardly be worried about belonging to what Nietzsche called the "strongest, toughest race in Europe." Oddly enough, Howard is probably less committed to the Zionist cause than is Blair, though this, unfortunately, is not saying very much!

TRUTH DOESN'T MATTER

'Racism' is just a form of words; and it doesn't matter if the words are true or not. The truth is no defence, according to the enforcers of Britain's race laws. But, unsurprisingly, this concept of racism does not extend to activities popular with the governing élite, such as machine-gunning Arabs in the streets of Iraqi towns on behalf of Uncle Ariel, or blowing up Sierra Leoneans in the presumed interest of gem companies like Ascorp or De Beers. For Blair, these are 'good' wars! At the back of very many minds is the unstated but persistent thought: where will the war be this year?

The Burnley speech by JT was, ironically enough, somewhat milder than some of the utterances on race by prominent leftists of the 1920s and 1930s, such as George Bernard Shaw or Sidney and Beatrice Webb. On reflection, it's also a good job that the rulings of the thought commissars can't apply to literary giants of the past. For under the provisions of the 1986 Public Order Act, numerous authors – from Chaucer to Dickens, from Sir Walter Scott to T.S. Eliot – would face certain prosecution if they were around today. In those far-off days, believe it or not, people were 'racists' without ever realising it.

Ordering the arrest of BNP people was one of his last acts as Home Secretary

The man in the street is not really perturbed by speeches with an allegedly 'racist' element but is instead most indignant about violent crime or drugs sweeping through his neighbourhood. He's also petrified that Gordon 'Prosperity' Brown is creating the conditions that will lead to the export of his job to China or India (if it hasn't gone already), and certainly not worrying about top Tories and their Transylvanian associations.

Brown is presently facing a massive black hole in the national finances. The chronically sick are to be forced off benefits in order to seek 'work' which is either non-existent or gone to immigrants imported for cheap labour. Now the Exchequer would be in a much better shape without the millions upon millions wasted on war and occupation in Iraq. This is a very strange state of affairs, no doubt, for which the Government must surely have its reasons. But perhaps Jim Moran, Cynthia McKinney or Senator Ernest Hollings could tell Gordon Brown the reason why! These are American politicians who virtually ruined their careers by daring to tell the truth about the role of the Jewish lobby in getting America into war with Iraq.

INTERESTING ENGAGEMENT

The other 'B' in government, Blair, had a rather interesting engagement just a few days before the arrest of John Tyndall. This was the lighting of the Chanukkah menorah inside 10 Downing Street. Interestingly enough, Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sachs was absent from this allegedly religious occasion, making the rather transparent excuse that he had to visit a primary school! Those who did make the gathering included Blair's patron Michael Levy, Israeli Ambassador Zvi Heifetz and Henry Grunwald, President of the Board of Deputies. Bush's White House had a Chanukkah lighting too, but no Christmas crib.

It was left to Israeli Professor Avraham Oz to point out the anomaly that Christian Arab students in Haifa are not allowed a Christmas tree while Chanukkah celebrations are held in the seats of power in London and Washington. But it would be a mistake to regard the Downing Street ceremony as necessarily anything to do with religion. Rather, it can be seen as a visible act of assent to a political power structure.

Now while I don't suggest that there is any sort of direct causative connection between this clubby meeting and the nationalist arrests, the conspiratorially-minded may well be wondering!

But the proscription of mild expressions of national feeling and racial solidarity in this country forms a neat contrast with the complete freedom of speech which is utilised by some of Ambassador Heifetz's compatriots. Examples are numerous, such as General Rafael Eitan's description of Arabs as "scurrying around like cockroaches in a bottle." Following General Eitan's demise a few months ago – he was swept away into the Mediterranean by a large freak wave – the system news media's usual description of him has been of a "bluff and straight-talking man." Nor does such intense racial hatred content itself with verbal descriptions, as shown by the obliteration of an entire family of seven Palestinian youngsters by a tank shell, while they were picking potatoes in Gaza.

RULE BY FEAR

So while this 'cockroach' talk is acceptable in the Middle East, in this country we are forbidden any reasoned, non-abusive debate on certain issues. As with the witchfinders and inquisitors of old, hardly any of the public believe the PC tyrants' doctrine, but they go along with them out of a mixture of complacency and fear.

Blair claims, in his characteristic half-baked Messianic fashion, that 'freedom' must triumph over 'terror'. It is all of a piece with George W. Bush's much-repeated inaugural commitment to 'freedom'. But how much freedom really exists in this country – or across the Atlantic? How much freedom is there for Ernst Zündel, who has now spent two years in US and Canadian jails for thought crimes?

Does 'freedom' in Iraq include the freedom for occupation forces to rape young boys in Abu Ghraib Jail – or the freedom to poison half the population there with DU ammunition, perhaps? Even the free elections held in Iraq under US auspices were not what they seemed: in many areas the issue of monthly rations was conditional on people registering votes.

And does British 'freedom' include the freedom for New Labour functionaries to harass the honest and diligent Dr. David Kelly into permanent silence?

How much freedom is there in the U.S.A. for the lab director Kevin R. Ryan, who reported to federal investigators that the steel in the WTC towers couldn't possibly have been melted by jet fuel? The freedom to be dismissed, that's all!

As the old saying goes, there are none so hopelessly enslaved as those who falsely believe they are free.

Truth is the most powerful weapon

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE once wrote: "To thine own self be true." This, for me, is the greatest attribute of a nationalist. Without truth there can be no honesty, honour, integrity or courage: the truth about ourselves, and whether we are truly doing all we can to advance the cause of nationalism; the truth about our enemies and their hidden agenda of destroying white western European society.

If we don't recognise the truth we can never truly deal with our problems, which of course is why our enemies go to so much time and trouble trying to bury the truth! Truth is the spring from which all other virtues flow, and it must first be recognised before it can be acted upon. In the end, truth is all there is; truth is all we have and we must never neglect it, by, for example, taking the line of least resistance – or, to put it another way, taking the easy option. This is anyway usually the least effective and productive course of action in terms of yielding results.

When a man lies he murders some part of the world! We must never lie; we must never exaggerate; we must never deceive ourselves or other people – the establishment, of course, being the exception! To do otherwise is to compromise our integrity and resolve.

Denigrating our fellow nationalists, or otherwise ridiculing and insulting them, should always be avoided, not least because if we all abide by this rule we tease out those amongst us who are agents provocateurs, whose primary function is to disrupt and fragment our movement by attempting to set one against another.

In nationalism, as in so many other walks of life, truth can sometimes only be identified by separating out from the general mass what is not important. Only then are we in a position to establish and concentrate on what is, so that we might then make more productive and better use of the time available. What, for example, is the point of complaining and getting angry about the problems we are facing when all we need do is simply accept totally and absolutely the very fact that we are, as a race and as a nation, standing on the edge of a precipice staring oblivion in the face, and that our enemies wish for nothing more than to see the very end of us and what we are? Would we not then save time, not to mention physical, psychological and emotional energy, by simply accepting this one fact?

LOOKING AT OURSELVES

The aforementioned energies should be channelled into much more productive uses! Personal development issues are what I am referring to here, because it is only as focused, dedicated and resolute individuals that we begin the process of building up a focused, dedicated and resolute organisation. It starts, ladies and gentlemen, with each and every one of us looking in the mirror and acknowledging the truth about whether we are truly doing all we can to help our movement succeed. Only as individuals bound up in one unified and concentrated force for good, channelling our very being into defeating our enemies, can we even begin to think about winning.

SHAKESPEARE
Said: "To thine own self be true."

There are, after all, many times more of us than there are of our enemies, and we are telling the truth! Why shouldn't we be able to win? The essential principles of becoming a successful nationalist, for me at least, are as follows: firstly, we must expose the truth about our enemies. When they say, for example, as happened recently, that the red cross symbol displayed on many public service vehicles is offensive to other faiths and that on this basis it must be removed, we must not blame the Muslim or the Sikh. These people are simply pawns in the game and are just being used as scapegoats. It is our political masters who want to eradicate our racial, cultural and religious bases by pretending that to maintain them is offensive to others! Of course, quite naturally the Muslim and Sikh are only too happy to go along with this agenda as long as it serves their respective group interests.

The watering down of the Christian festival of Christmas by renaming it 'Winterville' is another example of how our enemies are diluting our identity. This technique of progressively dissolving our history and culture whilst deflecting attention away from themselves by blaming others has to be exposed, and exactly along these lines. By these means the problem can be dealt with in the only successful way: by focusing attention on the politicians who are the real instigators of this destruction of our country. The point to be made here, then, is that our political masters are using immigrants and their belief structures as a vehicle to strip our nation of its inherited communal life. This evil strategy must be exposed, and the truth laid bare so that the people can see our enemies in the same way that we do. Only then will they awaken and support us.

NEVER APOLOGISE FOR WHAT WE ARE

The second principle involved in being a good nationalist is never to apologise, or adopt defensive postures of any kind, against the bogus and fraudulent arguments and accusations of our adversaries. We must stop running away; we must stand our ground, face them and then fight back, not least because there is nothing the general public despise more than cowards and apologists, especially when their apologies are not sincerely meant! People are more intuitive than we sometimes like to give them credit for, and I believe they will support us provided we are quite literally seen to be fighting back. There is nothing the public like more than an underdog who stands his ground and retaliates on their behalf, particularly if that public has an empathy with the underdog's cause – which of course it does in our case! By standing and fighting we also prevent our enemies from being able to chase us around with the proverbial big stick.

The fundamental basis upon which we must always fight back is that of recognising that our enemies are telling lies and that we stand for the truth. It cannot be repeated often enough that the mainstream political parties care nothing for the black and brown man; nor do they truly care about women or the disabled. These people are simply being elevated, promoted and used to destroy the white male. This, our enemies hope, will result in a society totally and completely devoid of discernible strength and thereby unable to bring to heel those who would have power over us.

CHALLENGING ENEMY LIES

All we need do then is develop ways and means of communicating the truth to our people, who will then, I firmly believe, give us their wholehearted support. Truth must always be not only the basis upon which we defend ourselves but also the basis upon which we attack our enemies. We must begin to challenge events, such as the 'Holocaust' Memorial Day, for example, by simply telling the truth and exposing it for the pure political theatre that it is. We should simply ask of the public and the media: "Why, all of a sudden after more than five decades of neglect and indifference, have our political masters decided to have public displays of grief especially for the Jewish dead of the Second World War?" Could it be because the peoples of Europe are at last beginning to wake up to the horrors of the enforced multi-racial society, which the political left has created and from which it has so much to gain? Are the dead then not simply being exploited for political profit? And should we not therefore simply concentrate our efforts on exposing those on the left for the manipulative, exploitive and immoral creatures that they undoubtedly are?

Nationalism is growing in strength the length and breadth of Europe, and is finally preparing itself to challenge the red beast. These crocodile tears about the alleged 'Holocaust' are nothing more than a pretence of sorrow that is not truly felt.

ACTING OUT A LIE
President Bush and his wife are seen here visiting the Holocaust Museum in Washington. Bush goes through this charade because he knows where the power is in America.

But is this kind of behaviour nothing less than what we have come to expect from shallow and corrupt people who will stop at nothing to cling to power, even when that means exploiting dead men, women and even children? As decent people, surely we cannot be seen to be participating in this orgy of leftist propaganda! This should be our moral position and the reason for our future absence from such charades. Telling the truth is all we have to do, comrades, and provided we do this in a calm and intelligent manner we cannot possibly lose.

BATTLE OF PSYCHOLOGY

Again, psychology is very important to our enemies, and it must therefore become very important to us because this is where the battle is being fought. An ability to assume the emotional point of view of other people therefore becomes crucial. When they attempt falsely to take the moral high ground with their bogus and sanctimonious calls for 'tolerance', we must reply that it is not a moral position to be tolerant of those things which are detrimental to the stability and well being of our society. And when they say we should not 'discriminate' we should reply that if we are to maintain our racial and cultural environment we must discriminate.

Town halls and public sector organisations the length and breadth of Britain are currently employing people upon the basis of the colour of their skin under the cleverly constructed fraud of 'positive discrimination'. Is this not discriminatory against white people?

EXPOSING THE FRAUD OF THE WORD 'RACISM'

And when it comes to the subject of 'racism' we should say that this is an invention of the left and that the word is a fraud which makes racial self-preservation a crime. We should also say that it is as wrong to dilute the black race as it is the white. We consequently state our case and justification for racial self-preservation for all peoples, without insulting black or brown folk, but we also simultaneously expose our leftist enemies for attempting to do the exact opposite! We should say that we want to preserve the racial identities of every people, and that the left wants to destroy them by forcing their evil and demonic, not to mention undemocratic, multi-racial experiment upon us.

Providing we are prepared take a little time examining and dissecting the fraudulent language of our enemies they are doomed always to lose the argument.

Kilroy and the world outside TV

AFTER many years as a television personality, mostly in the role of chat-show host, Robert Kilroy-Silk was abruptly dismissed for uttering disparaging remarks about some barbaric Muslim traditions. What he actually said was undeniably true, but this was of no avail in a media establishment gripped no less tightly by political correctness than the Vatican is by Catholicism. Kilroy obviously thought that years of chatting up countless Blacks and Asians on his TV show would protect him against any allegations of 'racism', so his dismissal must have been a severe blow to his self-esteem, not to mention his earnings. This event strikingly demonstrates the 'alternative reality' which TV has always been promoting, in which multi-racism, feminism and homosexuality, for example, are represented as established norms of British society.

The parachuting of Blacks and Asians into all popular programmes evokes groans of "Oh, not another one!" in countless households, pubs and clubs across the nation, as do the incongruous bimbos in the roles of police chiefs, judges, forensic scientists, etc. It doesn't matter that the people featured in these 'soaps' are depicted as habitual liars, adulterers, sexual perverts, crooks, prostitutes, spongers and layabouts, provided always that no hint of racial discrimination is apparent. The deracinated programme is the pasteurised milk of popular TV and radio entertainment.

Thus Kilroy-Silk seems to have experienced a dramatic 'Road to Damascus' enlightenment on emerging from this artificial world. With all the fervour of the recently converted, he is declaiming that mass immigration is stealing our country and that EU membership is destroying our civic freedoms and economic security.

No platform big enough

The Bible says there is much rejoicing in Heaven when one sinner repenteth; but here in the real world the reaction of people to Kilroy-Silk's apparent conversion to doughty patriot ranges from embarrassed disbelief to scornful contempt. Finding that no political party will offer a platform big enough to support his media-inflated ego, he feels obliged to launch his own party, titled 'Veritas', the Latin for 'truth'. It will, he claims, give the British people a way out of the wilderness created by the lies and distortions of other political parties. The 'truth' Kilroy now seems to have discovered has been staggeringly obvious to most people all along, through all those years in which he was conspicuously identifying with the multi-culti set and being all things to all manner of people. The great majority of British folk want their country – and that includes their mass media – back where it belongs, in the hands of the native population. So they're looking for a party openly and unequivocally committed to repatriating all unwanted immigrants and getting Britain out of the European Union.

Nothing – repeat, nothing – less will do. The UKIP, which Kilroy-Silk has just quit after failing to take it over, fulfils the EU exit requirement; so are we to assume he is sticking out for the repatriation commitment? If – and it is a very big 'if' – that's the case, then has he never heard of the British National Party? But of course, to identify oneself with the BNP clearly demands a quality that media luvvies like him so conspicuously lack: the courage of their alleged convictions.

Come the General Election, he may yet attract many of the people easily taken in by his practised bonhomie and TV charisma. The rest of us can draw some consolation from the fact that any votes he gains will be at the expense of parties other than the BNP. Moreover, his dismissal by the media moguls should have opened a few more eyes to their malign influence on our country and people.

THOUGHT FOR THE MONTH

Every so often, of course, the natives get a little more restless than usual and decline to be as enchanted as they are expected to be by this game of musical chairs. They look a little further back in time and recall that the two main gangs have had more than just one chance and have muffed things each time. They are willing to consider that behind all the talk of 'change' there is not really any change at all. At such moments, a dangerous number of these natives are inclined to say: "A plague on both your houses."

But our puppet-masters are ready for this too, for they always have in reserve a third gang – and even, if necessary, a fourth one – available to parade before the people to pick up the votes that some of the latter are no longer disposed, at least for the time being, to give to the first two gangs. This is of course the reason why the Liberals (now called Liberal Democrats), for long after they had ceased to be contenders for power in their own right, were kept on ice by the establishment and accorded a certain level of 'credibility'. They provided a useful safety valve for those voters who might grow disillusioned with both Tories and Labour.

JOHN TYNDALL (The Eleventh Hour)

THE POST of 'President of the World' is currently occupied – unofficially at least – by George. W. Bush, with Tony Blair waiting in the wings to claim it when Bush steps down. However, Bob Geldof's nominee, Nelson Mandela, seems to have all the credentials for that title.

Mandela was sentenced to life imprisonment in South Africa in the days of the civilised white Government of Dr. Hendrick Verwoerd. One of the ringleaders of a communist-terrorist organisation, Umkhonto We Sizwe, meaning Spear of the Nation, he was convicted on charges of plotting the overthrow of the legitimate government through the invasion of the country by troops of foreign communist powers – all this to coincide with countrywide strikes, civil disobedience, sabotage, revolution and murder, for which the manufacture and use of explosives were well advanced. In the words of the eminent prosecution counsel, Dr. Percy Yutar, "in reality the case was a classical instance of high treason, no longer sabotage but murder."

One participant in this conspiracy was John Harris, a friend of Peter Hain, wrecker of English cricket matches in the 1960s and now a Labour MP and Minister of the Crown. Harris was the ANC dynamite bomber of the Johannesburg Railway station in 1964, who killed a 77-year-old Welsh traveller, badly burned, maiming for life, her three-year-old granddaughter and injured 21 other innocent bystanders. Harris was subsequently tried, convicted and hanged. The then 16-year-old Hain, subsequently declared a prohibited immigrant, read his funeral oration.

Not all the conspirators at Rivonia, where transmitters netted into Moscow were also discovered, went to Robben Island with Comrade Mandela. Professional 'gentlemen' who had between the wars been afforded sanctuary, welcome and permanent residence in South Africa, or were the sons of parents granted those favours, fled the country and are now scattered throughout the Western World and Israel.

WHITE TRAITORS

Subsequent white traitors, some allegedly complicit in the murder of Verwoerd and charged with the change of political direction in South Africa, were allegedly bribed by the then British Government, one of them to the tune of £20 million, to release Mandela in preparation for African rule. No stranger to British governments' betrayals – heralded by the craven old traitor Harold MacMillan, under American pressure, the colonial African states fell like ripe plums into the hands of corrupt black leaders, none of whom had the foggiest idea of how to govern or administer the vast territories they inherited. Massive looting and corruption on a grand scale began at the top.

Before this fate befell South Africa, another highly developed, well-run, wealthy, steady, promising country, Rhodesia, was sold down the Zambezi to communism and murder by the equally craven Thatcher and Carrington. Lord Carrington was dubbed "that duplicitous bastard" by American General and later diplomat Alexander Haig. We recently had a bird's eye view of the razor-wired fencing and heavy, high barricaded gates of the properties in Cape Town's Constantia, as from his prestigious estate there, Mark, the second Baronet Thatcher, 'escaped' – sorry, turned state's evidence – from the consequences of his questionable arms dealing transactions.

Mandela inherited a wealthy, highly develmatter of expediency to prepare colonial Africa for independence.

Full of empty promises, Mandela guaranteed modern housing for all South Africa's inhabitants: a target to be achieved by many hundreds of thousands annually. This target was never reached in the first year, nor has it done so since! Like all the other African kleptocrats, Mandela squandered the rich resources of his country. At the end of his presidency, there was nothing to show but decline, decay, corruption, poverty and a flight of investment and of professional and skilled personnel from the country. Murders, rapes, muggings, burglaries, armed robberies and car thefts occur every minute of every day. With the addition of uncontrolled, untreated AIDS, Mandela's achievements are now ably upheld by Mbeki, whose father was one of his fellow convicted saboteurs.

CRIME RATE COSTING £6 BILLION

In mid 1996, Nedcor, one of South Africa's leading banks, claimed that crime in the country is costing almost £6 billion a year, considerably more than is entering it in foreign investment. Anglo-American announced it was writing £12 million off its central Johannesburg property portfolio, R70 million of that relating to its once prestigious Carlton Hotel, "the insidious and far reaching effect on tourism." Strikes, world sanctions, closure of ports, boycott of exports, refusal of landing and transit facilities to the country's aircraft, advocated by the 1960s African National Congress saboteurs, are no longer the occurrences that bring Africa to its knees!

Africa's real problem is one of governance. Its appetite for internecine wars contributes to its poverty. Some pundit or other, when recently asked: "What is wrong with Africa?" replied: "The Africans." The historian, Andrew Roberts, wrote in the Daily Mail on the 6th January 2005: "Re-colonise Africa." His views were supported, it appears, by "a small, disparate, yet brilliant, group of western academics and political thinkers, which is formulating a genuinely comprehensive, unprecedented and radical solution to the interlocking problems of the Third World indebtedness, lawlessness, corruption, starvation, endemic internecine warfare and genocide."

Roberts concluded his article by saying: "For the fact remains that in the long history of the Dark Continent, the brief period when ordinary Africans were most content, most schools, universities, hospitals and housing. The Africans, being advanced in keeping with their own pace, were progressing in the business world and in the medical, legal and other professions. It was generally acknowledged that their qualifications were genuinely gained and not fast-tracked, as pertained in seats of learning in 'liberal' countries as a

EDDY MORRISON takes a look at New Labour's latest piece of tyranny

IN FEBRUARY, the Government started pushing through a new law to ban what it calls "incitement to religious hatred." This measure, much beloved by liberals, is apparently designed to protect people alleged to be targeted because of their religious beliefs. There is nothing but tyranny in this evil bill. To me, it is merely further evidence that in Britain we need to carry on the battle for our right of free speech with every means at our disposal. Offence and insult are part of everyday life for everyone in Britain. All you have to do is open a daily paper and there's plenty to offend. Or you can walk into the religious section of a bookshop and discover you're damned to various kinds of eternal hellfire – which is certainly insulting, but that is just what religious differences are about. Argument and criticism are benefits, not abuses.

The idea that any kind of free society can be constructed in which people will never be offended or insulted, or in which they have the right to call on the law to defend them against being offended or insulted, is absurd. This proposed religious hatred law, carrying a maximum of seven years in prison, is quite probably the most ludicrous and unworkable law that an already tyrannous Marxist-Labour government has tried to foist on the British people. In the end, a fundamental decision needs to be made: do we want to live in a free society or not? Democracy is not a tea party where people sit around making polite conversation. In democracies, people get extremely upset with each other. They argue vehemently against each other's positions. The right to speak one's mind is fundamental to any free society.

State thumbscrews

In 1936, with the introduction of the Public Order Act, the state cracked down on Mosley's British Union, banning political uniforms and introducing numerous other restrictions on free speech and free assembly, invoking 'public order' as the excuse. Since then, the advent of the Race Acts, more tightening up of the Public Order Act and more lately the draconian anti-terrorism laws have all given governments a bigger set of thumbscrews and more power to turn them – and to turn them especially on white nationalists. This 'religious hatred' bill is yet another turn of the same screw!

The moment you say that any idea system is sacred – whether it's a belief system or a secular ideology – the moment you declare a set of ideas to be immune from criticism, satire, derision or contempt, freedom of thought or

Religious hatred law a bad joke expression becomes impossible. That is precisely what is happening in the UK. Marxist-Liberalism has a consensus which it defends ferociously, and any disagreement with it is to be made not just illegal but a positive sin against a multi-racial, multi-faith culture the ordinary Briton never wanted. In the sick society these rulers have created they are now introducing a new inquisition, with Torquemada replaced by the likes of Blunkett, Clarke and Straw.

A contract on his life was issued by the fanatically Muslim Iranian Government years ago. Laws against religious hatred are more likely to affect Muslims than indigenous Britons – though that certainly is not our own Government's intention.

With its proposed 'incitement to religious hatred' law, Prime Minister

Blair's Government has set out to create an impossibility. They know the law is designed to please the Muslims, and especially the massive Muslim vote. The ability of this law to protect Muslims seems arguable. It is possible that, instead, it could be used against Muslims before it's used against anyone else! We could make a strong case that Muslims are the ones inciting religious hatred, and this law is thoroughly appropriate to a religion that can, if it wishes, call for a 'jihad' – a holy war.

There is no question that there also are Muslim leaders who are anxious to prosecute others (witness the lengths to which they went against Rushdie: Islamic Iran declared a 'fatwah' on him; he was to be killed on sight for criticising the Koran in his book The Satanic Verses). So this law could unleash some major expressions of intolerance from the large Muslim population of Britain.

Rioting Sikhs already have forced the closure of Gurpreet Kaur Bhatti's play, Behzti, in Birmingham; and the Government has said nothing to criticise them for attacking the theatre, breaking windows and issuing death threats against those involved. Evangelical Christians caught on quickly and protested against the BBC's screening of Jerry Springer: the Opera. That still went ahead but the Behzti play was cancelled. This was a classic example of double standards used against Christians.

Threat to Britons' freedom

What this kind of attitude ultimately does, and what the law would do, is undermine a principle of free expression that affects everyone in Britain, religious or not. If we cannot have open discourse about the ideas by which we live, we are straitjacketing ourselves from our rights of freedom of thought, speech and action. Britons have the right to take an argument to the point where somebody is offended by what they say; that is the basis of free speech. It's no virtue to support the free speech of somebody with whom you agree or to whose opinion you are indifferent. The real test of free speech begins at the point when people say something you can't stand. If you can't defend their right to say it, then you don't believe in free speech! These liberal-Marxists believe in free speech only as long as it doesn't get up their noses. But proper free speech will always get up somebody's nose. The tyranny of the liberal chattering classes is intolerant to the point of Stalinism. They – these champions of 'democracy' – for the most part want the BNP and other organisations they oppose banned. Anyone not rocking the 'approved' consensus can have as much free speech as they like – though it's free speech in name only.

Tradition of irreverence

There is a long tradition of irreverent, raw and critical remarks about religion in Britain, some by very eminent thinkers, some by top comedians – like Rowan Atkinson in Blackadder, muttering: "bad weather is God's way of telling us we should burn more Catholics." Is Atkinson to be dragged through the courts for this humorous remark in its historical context?

At the most farcical, we in the Spearhead Group could, for instance, declare ourselves a religious society which worships Great Britain and the white race, and therefore demand that Searchlight magazine be prosecuted for inciting religious hatred every time that slimy rag attacks the SG and its members! In the end, everyone could proclaim himself the representative of a new religion and nobody could criticise anybody! This is already happening in the field of 'race relations'. Sack a black or Asian worker, and the claim of racial prejudice will often result in big payouts to the 'victim' awarded by employment tribunals. Other reasons for sacking may be offered – incompetence, laziness, insubordination – but these can be judged irrelevant; the race card is played and the multi-racial consensus dictates the outcome.

The scope provided by laws that enable people to be charged for incitement to religious hatred is so vast that it would make a complete nonsense of British justice. Someone wants to build a mosque next to your semi-detached? You complain? That could be incitement to racial hatred and could mean seven years in prison for you! Say nothing and applaud the mosque, then you can have as much free speech as you want!

We must all oppose this bad joke of a new law as much as we can. Free speech is already just about non-existent in Britain: this will be another massive nail in its coffin.

A tribute to Richard Molesworth and what he stood for

THE nationalist movement is the poorer for the loss of David Hill, Chris Green, Sam Barlow and Richard Molesworth, all of whom died very recently.

I did not know Richard Molesworth in person – that is, we never met – but I exchanged a number of letters with him a few years ago on the subject of nationalist culture. He was very concerned that music, in particular, was moving too far away from our native roots.

For all his years of stalwart service to the nationalist cause, Dick Molesworth was not stuck somewhere in an idealistic and irretrievable past. At the time he was busy composing electronic music on a computer, and he sent me some samples for my opinion.

He was also something of an artist, and he produced some cartoons that bitterly satirised those who opted to live a polite and comfortable life rather than do what needs to be done to alleviate our multi-racial nightmare.

He believed, as I do, that nationalist music should be firmly based on our European classical and folk traditions. This is not to dismiss rock and pop out of hand. The jig, reel and ballad are all there in them, and there is nothing un-British in an electric guitar or a lively beat.

Much good work was done in this respect in the 1960s (a much maligned decade and possibly the last in which one could still be proud to be British) by the folk rock bands, of which the most prominent was the Fairport Convention. Among the songs they recorded were many collected by Cecil Sharpe in the 1920s (before they could be lost) and now made available to a wider audience.

Nor, at least in its formative years, was rock'n roll entirely lacking in the European element. But that was combined with black jazz and blues – perfectly acceptable in their own way but hardly emanating from Worcester!

However, in the last 20-30 years the African element has almost taken over. Music in any age reflects the society from which it springs. And given nothing else, this is what young people want.

I will make a sweeping and simplistic statement here, but I think it is true nonetheless. Young people grow to like what they grow up with, and what they grow up with is what they are given.

If they are given sound, wholesome traditional values, including music, they will grow up to love them just as their forefathers did. If they grow up being taught to honour their flag rather than to rubbish it, that is what they will do.

Our schools are in chaos because discipline has gone and teachers feel themselves having to pander to what children want rather than make them learn what they need to grow up.

The church is in tatters because sound faith and tradition have been watered down or replaced by a flimsy liberal pseudo-humanitarianism geared not to "upset people."

Values have been diluted to make them palatable to "the people" rather than individuals being challenged to rise in the level of value, the higher goal of excellence.

Everywhere in our national life we see this weak

So what really happened to Michael Howard's grandma?

WHEN Tory leader Michael Howard first revealed that he had had a grandmother who died in Auschwitz there were many who did wonder. Almost every Jew one meets or sees on TV seems to have a relative who perished there. Actual documentary proof of who did or did not die in the concentration camp is virtually impossible to obtain, and so the world has to be content with the word of surviving spouses or kin.

JEFFREY TURNER examines new disclosures which add to the mystery about the Tory leader's family background

And talking of survivors, there seems to be an enormous number of them too! One is left thinking that if extermination of people in Auschwitz was indeed the Nazi policy it must have been carried out with incredible inefficiency – not a shortcoming usually associated with Germans. Did more get away than actually died? If so, what went wrong?

So when Mr. Hecht – sorry, Howard – told the story about his granny we were, to put a fine point on it, a little sceptical. Now, it seems, we are not the only ones.

It was revealed last month that freelance reporter Michael Crick had been doing a bit of digging into Mr. Howard's family background and had found that his grandfather, Maurice Hecht, had entered Britain illegally some time in the 1930s and that his son, Bernat Hecht (Michael's father) had lied about this when applying for British citizenship in 1947. Then father Bernat claimed that grandfather Maurice had died in Romania in 1939, whereas in fact he was alive and well at the time in London. The truth was that he (Maurice) did not die until 1952 – in London.

In the same application Bernat Hecht said that his mother, Leah Hecht, had died in Romania in 1943, when according to son Michael's story she had perished in Auschwitz (now Poland) a year later. This has now been recorded as a further lie, but was it? It all depends on whether one believes Hecht Senior's explanation or that of Hecht Junior (sorry, Howard)!

The Howard story is that his father, Bernat, left Romania to settle in Britain sometime in the 1930s, as also it appears did his father Maurice. Whether the two came over together has not so far been established. Howard has acknowledged that Bernat Hecht had come to Britain as an economic migrant: the region of Romania from which he had come was poor. However, some press accounts of the story have laid stress on the fact that, although the Germans were not then in the country, the spectre of Nazism and Fascism was looming all over Europe and there was indeed already a strong Romanian Fascist movement unfriendly to Jews. In whatever event, the story we are asked to believe is that father Maurice's wife, Leah, stayed in Romania when he and their son came to Britain. So he left her there to face the Fascist menace? Or had the two separated? So far there is no reference to any such event, and so we are none the wiser – only puzzled.

POLITICAL EMBARRASSMENT

These revelations about the Hecht/Howard family history have been used by Michael Howard's Labour opponents to embarrass him in the light of his recent declarations that as leader of a future Tory Government he would crack down hard on illegal immigrants. According to Labour and its left-wing allies, how could he when his own grandfather was one?

Michael Howard (seen here) has made great play about his grandmother's alleged death in Auschwitz, but the story is starting to look a bit ragged at the seams.

Good question! But it's not really the most important question. There are some others more deserving of enquiry, and I will come to these in a moment.

The Tory leader apparently got wind of the fact that Crick was going to expose this paternal background in a biography on him (Howard) due to be published shortly before the general election in May, so he pre-empted the exposure by volunteering an interview to the Daily Mail. The details of this were published on February 12th.

In the published interview Howard was reported as saying of his father's dishonest citizenship application:-

"I have speculated on the reason, and I suppose that one possibility is that my grandfather might have entered Britain unlawfully. What my father did was wrong. I don't condone it, but I don't feel embarrassed because I have done nothing wrong myself."

Well maybe, maybe not. It all seems to depend on whether Howard père actually informed his son of the porkies now under examination. Bernat Hecht/Howard died in 1966, by which time Michael would have been 25 years old. Mother Hecht/Howard, named Hilda and the daughter of Jewish immigrants from Russia, is still alive and living in North London, aged 93. Did neither of these parents ever explain to their son the circumstances of Bernat's citizenship application in 1947? This question would seem especially pertinent with regard to the time when Michael, as Tory leader, started to talk publicly about the problem of illegal immigrants in Britain. By then, Papa Hecht/Howard was long dead and gone, but Mama Hecht/Howard was still around. Did she not ever say to her boy: "Better be careful of getting into that argument, Mikey. Your granddad was an illegal immigrant living here and your dad told lies about this when applying for citizenship in 1947"? For this not to have happened would indicate monumental stupidity. The Hechts most certainly do not appear to have been stupid; together they built and ran three quite successful women's clothing stores in South Wales, where Michael was born.

The only other explanation for Hilda's failure to tell her son about what happened would be that she never knew about it herself: she never knew about her husband's lying citizenship application and the fact that her father-in-law was living in London until his death in 1952, instead of in Romania, as her husband claimed, because he had never told her! That is stretching credulity to the utmost.

So the question must be asked: when Michael now states that he never knew about his father's false citizenship application until it was revealed in the researches by Mr. Crick, is he being as economical with the truth as his dad was 58 years ago?

And this leads to a further question. The Tory leader has made a great song and dance about his grandmother's death in Auschwitz in 1944, but according to his father she never died there at all but in Romania a year previously. Which is true? Is either true?

AUNT IN AUSCHWITZ

There is another interesting aspect to the story, and it appears in the Daily Mail account. Grandmother Hecht apparently had a daughter, Rose. According to the story, the two were living together in Northern Romania when the mother was rounded up by the Nazis and put on the train to Auschwitz. The daughter could have avoided the same fate, as friends had offered to hide her; but she did not want to be parted from her mother and so went along with her.

Let Mr. Howard now take up the story at the point at which the two arrive at the concentration camp:-

"My grandmother and aunt were separated, as soon as they got off the train, by the SS guards. They were divided into two groups. "Those who were young, able-bodied and capable of work were sent one way. Those too old, too frail or too young to be of use... went the other way. At this point my aunt and grandmother were forcibly parted..."

From this it must be assumed that the younger woman was put into the category of the able-bodied and able to work, while the older one was not. But here there is a contradiction. Let Michael resume the story:-

CRICK
He appears to have dug up a highly sensitive can of worms.

"My aunt was taken to the gas chamber twice. On one occasion they ran out of gas and so she survived. On the other there was some malfunction.

"Then the third time they came to the barracks where she lived to take everyone in it to the chamber, but she was so thin – all she was given to eat were potato peelings – she managed to hide in the chimney. They didn't find her. She, alone among the group, miraculously survived."

EXTRAORDINARY

Now what a truly extraordinary set of circumstances! Again we see an example of the gross inefficiency of the Germans. First they allow the gas to run out (was the responsible engineer shot?). Then there is a malfunction – presumably of the gassing process (shoot that culprit too!). This seems to have happened a great many times and in a great many places, for Jewish survivors never cease to talk about it. Something always somehow went wrong just as they were about to be killed, and they got away. Miraculous!

But all this doesn't quite add up. Leave aside the fact that the Germans' customary thoroughness seems to have deserted them on so many occasions, and think about Aunt Rose herself. By her nephew's account she was put among the able-bodied and capable of work. Why on earth, then, would her captors want to kill her? And why indeed would they first reduce her to virtual starvation by a diet of potato peelings? That seems an extremely foolish way to treat people who were supposed to be at the camp to be used as 'slave labour'. If you want to use people as slaves you keep them strong and healthy.

But Aunt Rose was apparently reduced by these starvation rations to a state of such thinness that she was able to hide in the chimney when they came to take her away to the gas chamber. Were the SS guards – by repute the élite among the German forces – so slap-happy that they failed to look in such places? And didn't they anyway have a roll-call of the inmates, so that she would have quickly been discovered as missing? In fact, Rose ended up here in Britain, as did her father and brother.

The publication of Mr. Crick's book on Michael Howard will be awaited with much interest. No doubt it will probe into those embarrassing matters of his father Bernat's dishonest citizenship application, and perhaps ask the very pointed question that has been asked here: is it really true that Michael has only just heard about it?

But one rather doubts whether these other questions, the questions concerning what happened at Auschwitz, will be asked. That would be treading on a real minefield – a minefield onto which professional journalists in the year of 2005 still do not dare to venture. One day all these questions will indeed be subjected to genuine scrutiny. For the moment we may rest content that the credibility of the leader of Britain's Conservative Party has been called into very serious question. This will be a space well worth watching!

THE PEOPLE WHO JUST CANNOT BE CRITICISED

LONDON MAYOR Ken Livingstone got himself into a real spot of hot water when leaving a party at City Hall on 8th February. He got into an altercation with Evening Standard reporter Oliver Finegold, apparently over what he claimed was press harassment. As the argument became more heated, 'Red Ken' told the reporter he was behaving "just like a [Nazi] concentration camp guard."

At the worst, this remark was rude and rather silly, but that's all. Most normal people would have forgotten about it very soon after.

But Mr. Finegold happens to be Jewish, and he took great exception. And that's not all. The next thing was a national outrage in which members of the Jewish community from all over the place were shrieking protest and demanding an apology from Livingstone. The Board of Deputies of British Jews lodged an official complaint with the Committee on Standards in Public Life, and now Red Ken's political career is thought to be in jeopardy.

Meanwhile various former concentration camp inmates came forward demanding Ken's head, and a deputation of three of them turned up at City Hall a few days afterwards accusing him of 'bigotry' and of desecrating the memory of the 'Holocaust'.

In fact there was no evidence whatever that Livingstone introduced any 'racist' or 'anti-Semitic' element into the conversation. The argument with Mr. Finegold was a purely personal one; in no way could the Mayor's remarks be taken as an attack on Jews.

But that, it seems, is not good enough for the Jewish community. By having a go at just one of them – in an entirely non-racial context – Red Ken, it seems, is being accused of wanting to start a new wave of 'persecution'!

J. Edgar Hoover: besieged American patriot

J. EDGAR HOOVER (1895-1972) can, I believe, rightly be regarded as one of America's greatest patriots. He was recruited as a lawyer into the US Justice Department in the early 1920s, and became acting head of its Bureau of Investigation in 1925. He later became Director when the Bureau became the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). When he died he was an acclaimed hero, a symbol of much of what was admired in American public servants.

Yet he has been smeared by liberal biographers as an 'extremist' who abused his agency powers, and who ran a secret police force. None of this is true. He was essentially answerable to the Attorney General, and all his surveillance powers were authorised by America's leading statesmen.

ANTONY MILNE looks at a figure most untypical of his century

Throughout his life Hoover attracted powerful enemies because he was a self-confessed moral conservative. The truth is that he was reviled not because he was a law-enforcer but because he was outspoken. Hoover was a product of his times. He lived through much of the 20th century, and instinctively knew that America's rootlessness and rapid social change, its crime and racketeering, its race problems and its Marxist radicals could greatly harm its status as a civilised and powerful country. If Hoover didn't like the way things were shaping up in America, he said so in public speeches which were widely reported.

He particularly outraged liberals because he dared to verbally abuse 'radicals', as he called them, and did so to their faces. In other words, he played rough, outmanoeuvred his enemies and out-talked them, something that no right-winger in the West today would ever get away with. He was a remarkable powerhouse of energy, and managed to hold on to America's top police job for nearly 50 years, despite repeated attempts to remove him – an unparalleled achievement.

He was a brilliant organiser, with a shrewd ability to read the national mood and a capacity for self-advertisement. He published a slick magazine bringing the Bureau's views to every policeman in the land. His public message was couched in preachy hyperbole that referred to the dangers of 'moral deterioration', and of "new spectres haunting the Western world."

He continued to gain publicity in the 1930s, and later inspired many pro-FBI, anti-gangster movies. He went on a public relations blitz and did interview articles stressing he would not probe into the affairs of politicians or ever indulge in deliberate lying.

CRIME LABORATORY

Hoover built up the world's most impressive information-gathering machine. He developed a massive crime laboratory, where experts pored over ballistics and fibre evidence. Even after having been in charge for only a few years, he had by the late 1920s accumulated some 800,000 fingerprints of felons and suspected felons. The laboratory became the most advanced in the world.

Hoover demanded that his agents maintain almost puritanical standards in personal behaviour and appearance. With brutal speed, he fired those he thought could give the Bureau a bad name, or those who fell below his own standards of moral rectitude and industry.

By the late 1930s, honours began to flow in. The FBI became a super-professional American institution under his directorship. He was showered with honorary degrees, and travelled from coast to coast delivering patriotic speeches. No one, no matter how powerful, could attack Hoover without being accused of being unpatriotic or un-American.

But to pre-empt future attacks he began to develop a siege mentality, and expected his agents to follow suit. He steadfastly resisted attempts to bring the Bureau within the control of the civil service, rightly sensing that this would compromise both its neutrality and his own judgement of what would make a good 'G-Man', as his investigators were later known.

OFFENCE BEST METHOD OF DEFENCE

Throughout his life Hoover operated on the premise that the best defence was a good offence. He mounted spectacular, even reckless, counter-attacks everywhere. He adroitly neutralised criticism of himself, and fired off letters of complaint. He publicly questioned the motives of all who attacked the FBI, and implied that smear tactics were deliberately focused to undermine the political establishment itself. He ingratiated himself with top Justice Department officials, leading congressmen and presidents, affirming his admiration of, and loyalty to, all of them.

But he had an enormous cross to bear. As head of the FBI he was not only a police chief but head of an intelligence bureau. He had to indulge in wiretapping and covert listening, and this necessitated collecting rumours and gossip. This he thought acceptable so long as the information gleaned was not misused, and was kept under lock and key. When he was accused of building up 'snooping' files on liberals by a lot of "cheap, two-by-four flatfoot detectives," he exploited his detailed knowledge of lapses of judgement and the sleaze factors of his accusers. Politicians accusing Hoover of unauthorised surveillance of people were themselves accused of having inside information about wrongdoing upon which they, as lawmakers, should have acted.

Liberals hated him

Hoover trod a careful path in exposing wrongdoing and corruption: he took care not to go so far as to put his own career at a disadvantage. He played one rogue off against another. He knew that congressional rivals were only too willing to stir things up against him, or to cause adversarial turmoil on the political scene, and to discredit him into the bargain.

ATTEMPTED BLACKMAIL

The accusation has been made that Hoover could have done more to tackle organised crime in the bootleg years but for the fact that he was blackmailed over his alleged homosexuality. He was outraged by these accusations, and suspected ulterior motives, and he often sued people for suggesting it. The truth was that he had no alternative but to associate with alleged racketeers because as a national figure he was often introduced to them by politicians themselves. Having found out about dubious dealings, he felt it necessary to keep files on both the mobsters and the politicians. There is no evidence that he said explicitly, as has been alleged, that "organised crime does not exist in America."

Just before World War II, when the BI became the FBI, Hoover's adversaries tried to fight back. But he had tabs on them through his agents, who monitored all adverse public commentary on his directorship. Using covert methods, he could invariably turn the tables on them. But he did so largely from the vantage point of preserving America from underhand threats to its social well-being. His motives were also partly personal – for instance, he resented congressmen's efforts to steal the limelight from his Bureau or criticise his handling of its internal security investigations.

It was at the beginning of the Cold War, however, that Hoover saw the real danger of communist subversion, and stepped up his monitoring of union leaders, college student activists and pressmen who he said were "inspired by communists." He cited Comintern directives about political involvement in American public life. He told an audience of senior policemen in the late 1940s that communists were "panderers of diabolic distrust who are concentrating their efforts to confuse and divide... It behoves us to be on guard for an enemy that brazenly and openly has advocated the corruption of America."

Hoover found himself, as a result, even more besieged. He counter-attacked by using secret informer networks provided by various conservative business and fraternal organisations to sow anti-communist propaganda, with the aid of Father John Cronin and with the approval of the Attorney General, J. Howard McGrath. He also strengthened anti-communist attitudes in the Church hierarchy. He believed the end justified the means.

Ultimately, the FBI accumulated dossiers on all new members of Congress in regard to criminal, sexual or ethical lapses. But invariably Hoover showed the files he had on senior statesmen and lawmakers half apologetically. This was done partly to warn the politicians that they could be vulnerable to smear tactics should any negative information leak out, and to warn them to clean up their act.

A brief resurgence of the Left came in the late 1950s, when the Supreme Court, in a series of civil rights rulings, declared that Americans indulging in radical political activities had a right not to be monitored by the FBI. Hoover was angered by these destructive pronouncements, and fought back. Fortunately, most of the press was still then on his side; and Eisenhower, before taking office, was to learn the hard way that many professionals and other people in public life, denounced by Senator Joseph McCarthy, were indeed communists, as pointed out by the New York Herald Tribune.

INDISPENSABLE IN COLD WAR

At the start of the Cold War, with the Soviets testing their own atom bomb (using blueprints sold to them by foreign-born US spies) an alarming situation arose, and this made the intelligence files and commitment of Hoover even more indispensable. Wild accusations of disloyalty among American politicians and officials were flung everywhere in those paranoid times.

Hoover's problem was that he wanted to defend the office of the presidency, when many elected candidates themselves had sleazy dirty-tricks backgrounds. According to a former top law officer in 1974, Lyndon Johnson had used the FBI "as his private political police force," with Hoover supplying him, by one estimate, some 1,200 dossiers on individual US citizens.

According to former President Richard Nixon, Hoover told him that "every president since Roosevelt" had given him bugging assignments, including Nixon himself. Typically, Hoover was accused of covering all this up so that he could gain leverage on the White House, and thus stay on as Director until after the age of 70.

Hoover knew that the heroes of the Left were deeply flawed characters. There is evidence that Lyndon Johnson, in the 1950s when he was Senate Majority Leader, received half a million dollars from tainted mobster sources. On the day of Kennedy's nomination for the Democratic presidential candidacy on July 13th 1960, Hoover's deputy received a summary of the Bureau's alarming Kennedy file, full of stuff about hoodlum connections, scandalously reckless womanising with suspected foreign spies, and complex Mafia intrigues that may have led to his eventual assassination. The files hinted at vote-stuffing in the Chicago area that led to Kennedy's slim lead over Nixon in the 1960 election.

The changing political scene was just as bad. When Kennedy got into power, the American agenda moved away from communist subversion to the problems of crime, race and poverty. Hoover grudgingly prepared to go along with this, but still thought the communist menace was to be feared most – especially as he saw how the cultural, civil rights side of it was being abused. He knew that in America the Marxist economic arguments never held much sway, even among liberals. In public speeches he emphasised instead the continuing assault on wholesome American spiritual values. In 1963 he made a vitriolic attack on the corrupting effects of Hollywood and the TV industry, with its emphasis on violence, sadism and 'sensual trash'.

OPPOSED RACIAL INTEGRATION IN BUREAU

Hoover was also alarmed that Robert Kennedy, the new Attorney General, was determined to bring racial integration to the Bureau, which he feared would be a direct assault on its professionalism and integrity. He was also fearful when RFK took an activist role in black civil rights issues.

When the FBI was accused of not prosecuting civil rights abusers and those who attacked Blacks in the 1960s, Martin Luther King alleged this was because most FBI agents stationed in the South were southerners, and turned a blind eye to the crimes. This was plainly not true because Hoover had hand-picked most of his agents from his base in Washington, and in any event it was the courts whose job it was to take action in race attacks and not the FBI. Hoover branded King "the most notorious liar in the country."

But Hoover could see the writing on the wall for the future of a majority white America, under attack with massive migration in the 1960s to the northern industrial cities, and increasingly virulent rabble-rousing by black and white activists on the race issue, which has continued to this day. In a speech in Chicago in November 1964 he denounced civil rights criticism as the work of "zealots or pressure groups," having been "spearheaded at times by communists and moral degenerates." (Ironically this was the one year when his COINTELPRO Project, designed to monitor left-wing subversives, investigated the KKK for crimes committed in the Mississippi area, which to this day has tarnished Hoover's image in the eyes of some on the Right).

President Johnson himself, the arch-liberal who pushed the controversial 1965 Immigration Act through Congress that has resulted today in America's multi-racial society, believed that the Vietnam venture, which finally brought him down, was opposed by communist subversives. As the anti-war movement gained momentum, LBJ did not seek another term of office. But at this crucial time in America's history he was enormously thankful to the Director. "If it hadn't been for Edgar Hoover," he said to his successor Nixon, "I couldn't have carried my responsibilities as Commander-in-Chief, period. Dick, you will come to depend on Edgar. He is a pillar of strength in a city of weak men."

But Hoover was accused by the Nixon White House of not doing enough to counter radical movements, like the Black Panthers. In 1969 and early 1970, bombings or bomb threats were running at an average of 80 a day. There were 400 threats on one day alone in New York City. The offices of major telephone and computer companies were under attack, and 432 people were killed, with property worth $21 million destroyed. What riled the Nixon conservatives was Hoover's calling a halt to 'black bag' jobs in 1966 when Bureau methods came under unprecedented scrutiny by Congress liberals.

By the turn of the 1970s, the biggest struggle for Hoover was to stay in office. He regarded himself as virtually of civil service status, and judges and Justice Dept officials could stay on past 70 in many cases. Nixon was also worried that Hoover was outstaying his welcome, but his administration was happy for his right-wing support. Indeed all post-war presidents pondered on whether to sack Hoover, but found they needed his protection and his surveillance skills.

Nixon and his right-wing Vice President Spiro Agnew represented the very last of the true conservatives in America. But they were by now locked in mortal combat with the powerful establishment, which had become virtually liberal overnight. When Agnew's vitriolic speeches enraged liberals and communists, Hoover urged Agnew on, and increased his assistance by providing him with inside knowledge of violent activities on the campuses and in the Black Panther movement.

HELP FOR NIXON ON CRIME

Nixon was by now worried that Congress was also stonewalling his attempts to halt the rocketing crime rate in America. Again Hoover came to his aid with inside knowledge of the motives of those opposing Nixon's anti-crime mission. Both Nixon and Hoover were concerned about security leaks, and in particular about the unauthorised publication of the Pentagon Papers, detailing America's strategy in prosecuting the Vietnam War. Hoover authorised wiretaps on columnists like Joseph Kraft, who leaked politically sensitive information from the Paris peace talks.

Hoover, in his last days before he unexpectedly died of a heart attack in 1972, became deeply suspicious of the of the eastern seaboard liberal press, which was setting a left-wing agenda for the rest of America's media. He saw this as a security issue, as with the illegal break-in by radicals of an FBI office in March 1971 in Pennsylvania, when a lot of secret files on anti-war and black activist groups were leaked to the press.

In one of his last letters written to the Deputy Attorney General in 1971, Hoover denounced the Washington Post and the New York Times. He warned that "there is developing through the news media arrangements whereby they [the liberal press] are all exchanging columns and editorials... I said we seem to be getting a situation which poisons the public mind, and I don't think it is right."

At Hoover's funeral Nixon declared that he had been "the symbol and embodiment of the values he cherished most: courage, patriotism, dedication to his country and a granite-like honesty and integrity." Ronald Reagan, then Governor of California, declared that "No 20th century man has meant more to this country than Hoover."

ERNST ZÜNDEL UPDATE

LAST MONTH marked two years in which that champion of free speech, Ernst Zündel has been incarcerated in a Toronto jail by the Canadian authorities using an oppressive 'national security' certificate clause.

Supporters of the campaign to release him have staged five demonstrations, one in Edmonton (Alberta), outside the Canadian Deputy Prime Minister's constituency office; another was opposite the Canadian Consulate in Los Angeles on 4th February, to mark this sorry episode in Canada's legal history.

Protesters held large photos of the political prisoner and placards with the words 'Shame On Canada' written in large letters.

Mr Zündel is facing deportation to his country of birth, Germany, under a very rarely used and draconian security certificate that describes him as a 'danger' to Canada, even though he has lived in that country as a law-abiding citizen for 42 years. The certificate alleges that Zündel's writings could inspire others to violence. Incredibly, most of the evidence against him has been given to the Federal Court judge in strict secrecy. The real reason for this insane charade is that Mr Zündel holds views on historical events during the Second World War that are out of step with those officially approved in Canada and, in particular, by various Jewish Zionist organisations, which appear to exert great pressure and influence on the former.

Mr. Zündel had left Canada and was living in the United States with his wife Ingrid when he was arrested in February 2003 at his home in Tennessee and deported by US immigration officials for alleged immigration violations in that year (even though he is married to an American citizen). He was sent back to face imprisonment and further deportation court actions in Canada. He is now fighting deportation back to Germany, where he would face prosecution and yet another prison sentence for certain differences of opinion on events that took place some 60 years ago.

Demonstration of Zündel supporters in Edmonton (Alberta)

Zündel's lawyer Peter Lindsay is presently in the process of an appeal against this totalitarian legal action directed against him. Unfortunately, the case is being heard by an obviously biased and politically inspired judge, Mr Justice Blais.

In reply to the pro-Zündel demonstration in Los Angeles, a counter-demonstration was organised by the Jewish Defence League and several Jewish students, who waved Israeli flags and shouted obscenities at Mr Zündel's supporters.

Three further pro-Zündel demonstrations were also held the following day, Saturday, February 5th. Two, in San Francisco and Seattle, went ahead dignified, peaceful and without incident, but the larger demo in Washington DC outside the Canadian Embassy turned very nasty when a gang of communist thugs and Zionist agitators turned up to oppose the free-speech supporters. Some demonstrators were physically attacked and placards torn away. One brave supporter, Virginia newspaper columnist David Mullenax, sustained bruising and a mild abrasion. Disgustingly, urine bombs (balloons filled with body waste) were thrown by the left-wing fanatics, some landing in the cordoned off demo area.

There was some media coverage of all these events in the US and Canadian press and on TV, which helped to highlight the plight and struggle of Mr. Zündel in his fight against these tyrannical forces.

Almost all previous attempts to imprison or deport Mr. Zündel and damage his publishing business have been defeated.

Should anyone wish to send a message of support for Ernst Zündel, his current address is: Toronto West Detention Centre, 111 Disco Road, Box 4950, Rexdale, Ontario M9W 1M3, Canada.

MADHOUSE BRITAIN

A DISABLED MAN who used a hockey stick to beat off intruders at his home was arrested and thrown into police cells overnight for his trouble.

Philip Cook (56) grabbed the stick to defend his wife and daughter, both multiple sclerosis sufferers, after they were attacked outside the family home in Bristol following a request to a group of late-night revellers to keep the noise down. When the police arrived in answer to Mr. Cook's call, they apprehended him and later charged him with grievous bodily harm. He was eventually acquitted but not before 18 months of great family stress over the incident.

THE British Board of Film Classification has issued new guidelines concerning what is and is not offensive language harmful to the ears of young people. Under the guidelines, the most offensive swearwords, such as f... and c...t are more likely to be tolerated in films approved for viewing by younger teenagers. However, words like 'nigger' and 'Paki' will be more likely to ensure that a film is rated 15 or 18 (the minimum ages at which parents should allow viewing). 'Racism', in other words, is regarded as a greater evil than verbal obscenities!

A LIFEBOAT CREW have been refused National Lottery money because they don't save the lives of enough ethnic minorities, asylum-seekers or disabled or elderly people.

The Severn Area Rescue Association needs £5,000 to replace a 14-year-old Land Rover used to launch its lifeboats, but when the Association applied to the Lottery's Awards for All scheme the application was turned down.

Said Dave Walker, chairman of the station at Upton-upon-Severn, Worcestershire: "Our job is to rescue people. We don't check their nationality, age, disabilities or where they live."

A CLASS of eight-year-olds was brought to tears after they were encouraged to discriminate against each other in a 'prejudice day' at their local school.

Teachers made some of the class wear yellow T-shirts and the others white. The pupils in yellow were awarded privileges and given games and toys to play with while those in white were forced to take a maths test. At break time the yellows were allowed outside while the whites were kept in.

The purpose of the exercise, arranged at Penmorfa Primary School in Prestatyn, North Wales, was to teach pupils what it was like to be 'discriminated' against, and was part of a course to teach the children about the work of Martin Luther King and Nelson Mandela.

And we remind readers again: these kids were eight years old!

SIR: There are good reasons why we nationalists do not need to be associated with the alien hoax religion of Judaic-Christianity, as was suggested by Steven Smith in his article last month.

Regarding George of Cappadocia (known in England as "Saint George, our patriot saint"), he was in fact a corrupt parasite who became very rich through his misdeeds while supplying the Roman army with bacon. To escape arrest and trial, he fled with his fortune to Alexandria, in Egypt, where he set up a valuable library, after which a local faction promoted him to the throne of Athanasius.

As an archbishop, George now had immense power; and he soon acquired, often by devious means, monopolies of myrrh, salt, paper, funerals and tax on houses in his area. Due to the corruption in his administration, George was dismissed and dragged in chains to the public prison along with his two masters of the mint.

After 24 days, the prison was forced open by the local people and the lifeless bodies of the archbishop and his associates were carried through the streets on the back of a camel and dumped into the sea.

How the infamous George of Cappadocia was transformed into the renowned "St. George" of England, patron of arms, of chivalry and of the garter, is difficult to understand.

There is no credible historical evidence showing that that person born of a virgin and then named Jesus Christ taught the gospels during the years 30-34 AD. There is also much doubt that his alleged chroniclers, Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, wrote the chapters attributed to them: some scholars now think that these were written by a person (or persons) unknown some 30-50 years later than when Jesus is supposed to have said all these things.

We do have good reason to believe that Rabbi Saul of Tarsus (known to Christians as St. Paul) conceived Judaic-Christianity as a powerful propaganda device, with much of his sources for this coming from an earlier Jewish pacifist sect called the Essenes. Most of the other sources of the fake Judaic-Christianity story was pilfered from other peoples' religions.

If we are to have a religion it needs to be a good one, not containing such negative advice as given in the Judaic-Christian Bible, such as "resist not evil," "take no thought for the morrow," "turn the other cheek," "blessed are the meek" or "if any man come to me and hate not his father, mother, wife and children"... and so on.

Judaism was designed to unite the Jews into a solid ramrod, while Judaic-Christianity was designed to divide, confuse, weaken and destroy their enemies, particularly the Romans, some 2000 years ago.

A religion for us nationalists needs to be based on the laws of nature – for the survival, expansion and advancement of our own white ethnic group.

And we need to believe in facts that are substantiated by clear evidence, which are more valid and meaningful than supernatural claims that are unsubstantiated and fly in the face of reason.

E. WALTER CARR

(EDITOR'S NOTE: We have now heard both sides of this argument. The debate is now closed.)

SIR: Colin Vernon's article on the fall of David Blunkett (January issue) omitted to mention that Blunkett's lover, Mrs. Kimberley 'Quinn' was born a Solomon in Los Angeles, one of the world's principal centres of cosmopolitan power. The biography which destroyed Blunkett was written by Stephen Pollard, a Jewish journalist.

Maybe the unfortunate Mr. Blunkett was really thinking of using his position as Home Secretary to bring about genuine restrictions on immigration, or maybe he was just a disposable Shabbaz Goy, to be replaced (as has now happened) by the ex(?)-communist Charles Clarke.

The Communist Party of Great Britain had a very strict rule (made by Lenin himself on a visit to London in 1880): it should never recruit ethnic English members. "The English are temperamentally unsuited to communism," Lenin decreed. So is Mr. Clarke truly English?

I think history has proved Lenin wrong on this matter. The English have indeed taken to communism with enthusiasm; only it is called 'New Labour'.

The tossing aside of Mr. Blunkett shows how easily any Englishman, now matter how high he rises, can be defenestrated by his cosmopolitan puppet-masters. Ironical – considering how many of his fellow-countrymen he himself ethnically 'cleansed' out of Sheffield when, as leader of the City Council, he promoted immigration and 'diversity' there. But then is he really English/British? And is 'Blunkett' his real name? How can we have free elections when so many politicians and media pundits operate under aliases, just like criminals? What do they have to hide?

SIR: AIDS and TB are soaring because of a gaping hole in health checks when applied to immigrants, even when they include doctors and nurses. The numbers migrating from countries with high risks of disease have rocketed. This has sparked fears that infected people apply to get into the UK knowing that there are no proper tests here. Four out of ten nurses and three out of four doctors recruited in 2003 were from overseas, and analysis shows that 3,200 doctors and 1,300 nurses arrived from Africa, where the HIV rate is one in five. Yet none of the recruits was tested for any diseases.

47 countries, including the United States, test health job applicants for HIV. Such screening should be made compulsory in Britain, and those who fail it should not be allowed in.

SIR: Now we have the Prime Minister telling us that we definitely do have a right to worry about immigration and so-called 'asylum-seekers'. Well, thanks very much Mr. Blair, but why has it taken you so long to acquaint yourself with the facts?

Everyone else who really cares has known for ages that 'asylum-seekers' are not what they claim to be (most of them at least), and that immigration is going through the roof.

Of course, it does help if you live somewhere other than 10 Downing Street and holiday at locations other than super-rich men's palaces.

Put these things together with Michael Howard's sudden 'conversion' to a belief in the seriousness of immigration, and what have you got? A series of policies utterly derided and declared 'racist' only a few months ago when they were put forward by the BNP – policies which have been advocated by the BNP for many years, in fact.

What has happened to make Messrs. Blair and Howard see the light? Of course, there's a general election in the offing, isn't there?

SIR: Amsterdam, Holland, was the liberals' dream city. It was elevated as proof that all races and cultures can mingle harmoniously, given a little tolerance.

But now race war has erupted in Amsterdam. Since November last year, over twenty mosques, churches and Muslim and Christian schools have been petrol-bombed and trashed. White people have been murdered on the streets with guns and knives, and their killers were non-Whites.

Thousands of Dutch people have now had enough. They are leaving their country in droves, mostly bound for other white countries, such as Canada, Australia and New Zealand. The emigres are mostly highly educated people with the skills essential for a nation's prosperity. Multi-culturalism and multi-racialism have failed these white folk.

Rita Verdonk, an immigration official, has said: "We were naïve in thinking people would co-exist in society together."

Race crimes, or just business as usual?

More murders, more shootings, more rapes, more burglaries, more muggings; and, although it may be politically incorrect to mention it, we believe that at the root of this fearful spate of crime is Britain's foolish flirtation with the multi-racial society.

Thieves, vagabonds and homicidal maniacs we have always had, as far back into history as records will go. The difference today is the sheer scale of the mayhem to be seen in our native land. And this in a nation where more money is spent on health, education and welfare than ever before.

No one anywhere is safe in this vortex of evil and depravity but, as may be expected, some areas are more dangerous than others. Also, in such a melting-pot society, it is not unreasonable to suppose that some of these crimes may be racially motivated; and the assumption that only those from ethnic minorities can be victims of 'racism' is clearly misguided. Nevertheless, in the context of a whole nation now threatened day and night with murderous, pre-primitive savagery (between 2001 and 2003, eight hundred and fifty girls under 16 were raped in our capital city) we were somewhat surprised to read that the presumably well heeled Jewish community in Stamford Hill, North London, has lodged a complaint with the Met for not responding to what are referred to as 'anti-Semitic' attacks in the area. Women are reported as saying that they are too scared to go out at night, and that their children now fear using buses. Join the club!

Kiss and don't tell!

How is it that unmasked offenders against decency such as Blunkett and Mandelson get away with slaps on the wrist and promises that they'll soon be back on the gravy train? Is it because these malefactors know enough about the antics of the rest of the crew to make it imperative that they should always be let down lightly?

THE WAY WE LIVE NOW

Some observations on contemporary society

argued that the worst thing about the American Civil War was the result. Over 40 years ago, three 'civil rights' workers (the words invariably conjure up an image of dissolute young people with not enough to do, and unable to mind their own business) descended upon the tiny town of Philadelphia, Mississippi. Generally they were, to say the least, unwelcome visitors; and, not surprisingly, they were anathema to the Ku Klux Klansmen in the district. Eighteen of these latter were suspected of murdering James Chaney, Andrew Goodman and Michael Schwerner, and were charged with violation of civil rights in a federal (Yankee!) court in 1967, where seven received prison sentences. However, none were charged with murder until District Attorney Mark Duncan authorised the arrest of 79-year-old Edgar Ray Killen, who will be prosecuted this month. Behind the scenes, as might be expected, we find a multi-racial pressure group with nothing better to do than try to put an elderly man in prison for the last few years of his life.

On making the Grade

Not always in the wrong, the BBC very correctly defended the right of its Radio Four correspondent, Barbara Plett, to burst into tears when a frail Yasser Arafat was airlifted from the West Bank. But this went against the grain for recently appointed Chairman of the Corporation Michael Grade, who is quoted as saying that "this reflected the instincts of the old culture."

When addressing criticism that BBC News frequently demonstrated an inherent bias towards 'liberal' pro-European or anti-Israeli views, the Chairman agreed that this was not acceptable, and said that journalists must "neutralise individual bias through a self-critical and dispassionately professional approach." This egomaniacal demand may perhaps be paraphrased as: "Freedom of expression will be allowed as long as you express things my way," or maybe: "If you're not winning then re-write the rule book." Who was it who recommended that this arrogant, self-centred halfwit should fill such an important and powerful public position?

DIY English

Whether it is truancy, illiteracy or unacceptable classroom behaviour, the stories reaching us from the education scene tell us of a system paralysed by mismanagement, incompetence and downright cowardice. Tory bright sparks, who reckon it is their turn to govern, try to lay all the blame on Tony's hopeless mob of parvenus. But, in reality, the standards in our schools have been going downhill for decades, and can be seen to be worsening with every educational news item which gets into print.

Now the traditional teaching of grammar has come under attack. Teachers – that is to say the few who are still competent – are wasting their time explaining the meaning of verbs, nouns and pronouns, according to academics at the University of York. Instead they should seek to improve children's compositions by "abandoning the rules of syntax and encouraging them to try experimental methods of sentence construction." The Chairman of The Queen's English Society described this 'research' as "absolute balderdash." Hopefully somebody, somewhere, will be prepared to listen to him!

Whites behaving badly?

Africa Dube (no relation of George W. Bush) is illiterate, and lays the blame for this on apartheid, although there are of course several million uneducated persons around the world – and here we must include Britain – who were raised under regimes reputedly more benign than that which once exercised power in South Africa. However, Mr. Dube is different in so far as this former van driver is now a company director, thanks to BEE (Black Economic Empowerment). He has a telephone, a big desk, a suit and tie, and is labelled logistics manager though, on his own admission, he does not know what that means! Taught how to write his name by his co-directors, he signs a wad of blank cheques every month and passes the rest of his time playing computer games. Surely, therefore, all this is a complete waste of money as far as the white owners of the business are concerned. Far from it! Recently they craftily put Mr. Dube 'in charge' of an affiliate 'front' company, ostensibly black-owned and thus likely to be preferred when tendering for lucrative local government contracts. This ingenuity was described by Durban's city manager as "A total betrayal of the democratic process, and one of the worst forms of corruption in the country today." What? Worse than the arrest of 40 South African MPs in connection with a £1.5 million travel scam?

Ought we in Britain to be treating all this as serious international competition in the fraud stakes? Surely not, so long as we have the EU Commission jockeys in the saddle!

True grit

It is recorded that some few years after the Battle of Hastings the Conqueror dispatched an army to Ely charged with the task of quelling Hereward the Wake and his rebellious Saxons. But this was never going to be a fair fight. In typically underhand fashion the Normans hired a local witch to confront the defenders from a high platform where she harangued and cast spells on the heroes of the Fens, finally baring her backside to them three times. While this display might well have daunted lesser men, it served only to inspire Hereward and his companions, who toppled the witch and won the day!

Money! Questions and Answers (Father Charles E. Coughlin) £10.75. The famous inter-war American 'Radio Priest' explains why money should be the servant of the people and not its master.

Mosley's Men in Black (John Millican) £30.00. This hard cover book, which contains many illustrations in full colour, gives details of the flags, insignia, uniforms and badges of the pre-war BUF. In addition, there are many fine portraits of the leading personalities.

Music in the Third Reich (A.V. Schaffenberg) £2.50. Fascinating history of blossoming talent.

Myth of the Noble Savage, The (Kerry Bolton) £6.75. About the falsification of history as a cultural weapon.

Norse Poems (W.H. Auden and P.B. Taylor) £7.60. Old Icelandic poems translated to capture the rhythmic quality of the originals.

Oswald Pirow, the Founder and Leader of the South African New Order (Oswald Pirow) £5.00. In this booklet Oswald Pirow describes his 1938 diplomatic mission to Europe during which he met the leaders of Portugal, Spain, Italy, Germany and Britain. His search for ways to avoid war and, failing that, to keep South Africa neutral were not to be fulfilled. This record reveals many of the problems that confronted the pre-war peace movement.

Palestine Catastrophe (Michael Palumbo) £9.00. A book about the 1948 expulsion of a people from their homes and lands.

Peace Weavers and Shield Maidens (Kathleen Herbert) £4.95. About women in early English society. One thousand years before the Normans came, British women were playing an important role in the making of our nation.

Perkin Warbeck Conspiracy, The (Ian Arthurson) £10.95. Warbeck claimed to be one of the Princes murdered later in the Tower of London. He was used by those in power and came close to changing the course of European history.

Poisoned Chalice (Henry Klein) £4.50. The autobiographical story of the lawyer who defended those who wanted peace with Germany during the 'Great Sedition Trial' in the USA.

Protocols and the Push for World Government, The (Admiral Sir Barry Domville) £2.10. An analysis of what the 'Protocols' forecast, compared with what has actually taken place.

Radio Priest and the Union for Social Justice, The (Father Charles E. Coughlin) £3.90. This book contains a 20-page transcript of a broadcast made by the Radio League of the Little Flower. Father Coughlin, the most popular churchman of his generation in the USA, here defends himself against a vicious attack by General Hugh Johnson.

Rebuilding Russia (Alexander Solzenitsyn) £8.00. Reflections and proposals from this talented and extraordinary man.

Robin Hood (J. Ritson) £11.50. Ancient poems, songs and ballads. First published in 1795.

Rudolf Report, The (Germar Rudolf) £20.00. A scientific examination of the 'gas chambers' of Auschwitz and related issues. 450 pages.

Runes (J. Dees) £11.95. An entertaining and instructive book on the meaning of these ancient symbols and the mythology of each individual sign. A beautiful production.

Serpent's Walk (Randolph D. Calverhall) £7.95. A fictional story of a revolution in 2049. This time, as the author says, "The Good Guys Win."

Setting the Record Straight: Letters From Cell No. 7. (Ernst Zündel) £10.00. The story of vengeance by the Canadian Government against a man who dared to challenge the orthodox version of the 'Holocaust'.

Struggle for World Power, The (George Knupffer) £9.95. About the bid for global control by the faceless men of the secret world government.

Thug or a Million Murders (Col. James L. Sleeman) £12.50. The devotees of the cult of 'Thuggee' in India were murderers who believed they had the protection of the goddess Kali. The writer's grandfather was principally responsible for eliminating the cult, and this book relates the story of his endeavours.

Tomb of English People, The (Duncan Balmer) £8.70. This new book gives a concise history of England and contemptuously spurns political correctness. As the author points out, the graves of our ancestors may be found all over the earth, but our influence remains.

To Restrain the Red Horse (Alan D. Armstrong) £11.95. About the urgent need for radical economic reform.

Torture (A Report from the CDL) £3.30. A compilation of the evidence which shows that the United States Army used cruel and barbaric methods of torture upon its prisoners when the Second World War was over. A timely report sub-titled 'From Germany to Iraq'.

Towards World Government (Deirdre Manifold) £10.75. A timely warning of the coming world dictatorship.

Victory Through Defeat (Edited and Introduced by James Warner) £3.30. A post-war interview by Serge Brousseau of the famous Canadian Nationalist Adrian Arcand, in which some surprising theories are put forward and discussed.

We Accuse: Deborah Lipstadt, Professor of 'Chutzpah' (K.R. Bolton) £3.30. A critique and analysis of Lipstadt's book Denying The Holocaust. This booklet exposes the many tricks that are used to smear researchers into the real operation and purpose of the concentration camps.

Western Intelligentsia and the Soviet Union, The (D. Heald) £4.00. A selection of quotes praising Stalin and the red dictatorships in Eastern Europe by a range of liberal intellectuals. These are the words that their authors want forgotten.

Witness to History (Michael Walsh) £6.00. There are probably more facts and quotes regarding the Third Reich in this A4 magazine-size book than in any other publication.

World Conquerors, The (Louis Marschalko) £16.95. A great mine of historical detail that explains much of what brought European civilisation to death and destruction: a period that the author describes as "The Second Feast of Purim."

Yesterday and Tomorrow. £4.50. Essays by various nationalist authors. About the tradition of National Revolution.

Zionist Terror Network, The (Institute for Historical Review) £5.75. The background and operation of the Jewish Defence League and other criminal Zionist groups in the USA are investigated and exposed.

LEGAL FUND: £1,900 RAISED

Contributions to our Legal Fund over the past month have raised the total to £1,900.00. Everyone has been sent a personal thank-you letter signed by our editor, but we thank them again here.

As readers will know, the fund has had to be opened – once again – for the purpose of raising money to finance a civil action in the High Court against British National Party Chairman Nick Griffin for authorising the expulsion of our editor, John Tyndall, from the party. Mr. Tyndall was expelled in August 2003 but was reinstated after legal action. Now Mr. Griffin is at it again! It is noteworthy that the charges upon which Mr. Tyndall was expelled this time were brought a short time after he had announced his intention to make a constitutional challenge to Mr. Griffin for the party leadership.

Mr. Tyndall totally rejects the charges against him, which were heard on 4th December by a tribunal appointed by or on the authority of Mr. Griffin.

The matter has been placed in the hands of a firm of solicitors, who are making an application for judicial review of the case in the High Court in London. We are confident that the outcome will be the same as previously.

In the meantime, however, some legal expenses are going to be incurred. Quite reasonably, the solicitors have requested an 'up-front' payment of £500.00 to begin proceedings, which has been sent. More will obviously be required before the case is concluded. We ask all supporters to give generously so that this action may be pursued to a victorious conclusion.

If the action is successful and full costs are awarded the plaintiff, donors will be given the option of their money being returned.

All contributions should be marked 'Legal Fund' and sent to PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT.

OBITUARY

Sam Francis

We were greatly saddened to hear of the death last month of Sam Francis, who passed away in hospital near his home in Alexandria, Virginia, U.S.A, as a result of complications following recent heart surgery. He was 57.

Sam Francis was probably the finest nationalist writer in America and possibly in the English-speaking world. Born in Tennessee in 1947, he graduated with a PhD from the University of North Carolina in 1979. He once worked for the Washington Times and received the Distinguished Writing Award for Editorial Writing from the American Society of Newspaper Editors in both 1989 and 1990. He was later fired from his paper for his outspokenness. Then he went freelance, and until the end produced a regular and most popular syndicated column.

Our editor had the pleasure of a most enjoyable and interesting lunch with him when visiting his home area only last June. He seemed then in good form, and his death has come as a real shock. Our sympathies go out to all his family and close friends.

The Eleventh Hour

The Eleventh Hour has sometimes been described as the 'Bible' of British Nationalism. First published in 1988, it was updated in the 1998 edition to take in the many developments occurring on the political scene in the intervening years. Written by the founder of the British National Party, John Tyndall, the book gives comprehensive coverage of all the major current issues affecting Britain. It delves into the ideologies of liberalism, conservatism and the left, and also examines that of British Nationalism and its background. It contains an extensive analysis of the British economy and political system. It looks at issues connected with freedom and order, the mass media, the environment, race and immigration, Northern Ireland, the Commonwealth, foreign policy and defence. It also gives a detailed outline of the development of the BNP and its predecessor organisations in Britain.

The Eleventh Hour runs to 537 pages. It is partly autobiographical, giving an account of the author's origins, early political awakening and subsequent life's work.

Price: hardback £25.00 plus £4.78 p&p; softback £17.50 plus £3.75 p&p.
Please make out cheques to Albion Press and send orders to PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT.

Excellent Spearhead Group rally

LAST MONTH'S protest rally organised by the Spearhead Group attracted an audience of some 80 nationalists, most of them British National Party members. The rally was held in Buckinghamshire on 20th February in protest against the series of expulsions, suspensions and proscriptions that have been carried out by the BNP leadership against members and would-be members who have dared to utter dissent over recent party policy changes and attempted changes on the part of the leadership.

Ian Edward chaired the event and announced the first speaker, SG Secretary Eddy Morrison, who gave a most interesting talk about the development of the Group since its foundation last year. He was followed by Steven Smith, former Burnley BNP organiser, who explained some of the attributes that made his branch the most successful in the party's history. Former West Midlands BNP organiser Keith Axon then read out a formidable list of indictments against BNP leader Nick Griffin, including totally irresponsible wastage of party funds.

Sharon Pastou of Burnley BNP spoke next, and accused Mr. Griffin of bankrupting the BNP.

After a break for an enjoyable buffet, Peter Rushton took the floor and spoke about the appalling takeover of London by ethnic minorities, as seen by a northerner on occasional visits.

Tess Culnane returned to the theme of party purges, reading out a long list of nationalists who have been victims of the leadership's paranoia.

Richard Edmonds then spoke, and in a lively address condemned utterly the same pointless bloodletting.

The final speaker was Spearhead editor and former BNP leader John Tyndall. He stressed the need in the present party crisis for people to keep their heads, and said that eventual victory will go to those who do so and practise self-discipline.

A magnificent collection raised over £700.

Finally, thanks and praise must go to Rick Fawcus and Tyr Services for organising the event and to Sharon Pastou for providing, as she so often does, the very tasty buffet.

secure, most justly governed and least likely to be oppressed by their tribal enemies was when they were administered by the British Empire." No quarrel with this, except to say that the vast contributions of other European colonisers should not be underestimated.

Africa abounds in rich untapped mineral wealth and resources. Properly governed and administered, it would not need outside aid. Its poverty now is of its own making. Filling Mandela's begging bowls; plugging Geldoff's silly day-dreams; fulfilling Gordon Brown's fantasies about wiping off Third World debts (until the next time!) and handing back the proceeds saved for corrupt leaders to thieve and squander; and advancing Blair's hallucinations about being Africa's saviour: none of these things will save Africa from itself.

The writer of this article, Myra Hannah, lived for some years in Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia), where her husband was a district judge. Myra Hannah herself was called to the bar in Britain but never practised there. She was later admitted as an attorney in Swaziland. She now lives in retirement in the South of England.

Steven Smith speaks. Behind him is the famous sandwich board used by him to patrol the streets of Burnley at election times, used here as a presentational aid.

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence another reason for our needing additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be appreciated. Thanks.

THEY MUST BE JOKING!

This is a Tory election poster that one of our readers spotted near his home in London. The reader was resourceful enough to take a photo of the poster and send it to us. For sheer chutzpah, today's Tories really take the biscuit. For all these years, the party has done nothing effective whatever about immigration, whether in government or in opposition. On the contrary, they have regularly and viciously attacked the British National Party for speaking out on the issue and warning the British people of the prospect of national ruin if immigration is not stopped and reversed and if the multi-racial society and 'race industry' that go with it are not dismantled.

Yet now, as the Tories under Mr. Howard (himself the son of an immigrant) sense that the voters are getting really angry about the flooding of Britain and ready to vote for the BNP in ever larger numbers, what do we see but them quite cynically donning bogus new clothes and coming out as the party that is going to stem the tide of immigrants!

"Are you thinking what we're thinking?" says the poster at the bottom. Well, maybe the Tories have been thinking immigration is wrong for a long time, but what have they actually done? The answer is a clear zero!

Of course, they tried it once before, when the then Mrs. Thatcher came out with a statement on TV about the British people fearing being 'swamped' by immigrants. But what did the 'Iron Lady' ever do when in power once the statement had fulfilled its purpose of conning many voters? Again a spectacular zero!

The British people must not allow themselves to be conned by the Tories a second time!

ROD LIDDLE, the journalist (pictured right), came out with a most extraordinary observation in an article in The Spectator on 19th February. The article was headed 'Why Labour does not need the Jews', and it attempted to explain that the Labour Party is now no longer as dependent as it used to be on the goodwill of the Jewish community in Britain, since the Muslims are now far stronger in numbers and thus have many more votes. This, he claimed, is why winning favour with Muslims is much more important than doing so with Jews.

One has to ask: what planet is Mr. Liddle living on? The political power of Jews in Britain has never been measured by the numbers of votes they can deliver at election times but by their enormous influence in the world of commerce, high finance and the mass media. Today, many of Labour's biggest financial donors are Jewish. Jews exert totally disproportionate power in broadcasting, particularly TV. They own a number of the biggest newspaper groups, including the Express Group and Trinity Mirror, and they exert huge influence over the media through advertising, whereby they can deliver newspapers and TV networks to ruin by withdrawal of advertising revenue. Go back to school, Mr. Liddle!

... AND SO MUST HE ▸
